

Contributors

MICHAEL D. RUBENSTEIN is an Assistant Professor of English at the University of California, Berkeley. His essay was reworked from a chapter of his dissertation, "Occult Economies: Irish Literatures in Debt."

TODD KUCHTA, who teaches at Whitman College, is completing his doctoral dissertation in English at Indiana University. Entitled "Semi-Detached Empire," it examines the relationship between imperialism and suburban development in Victorian and Modern British culture.

ELIZABETH OUTKA is an Assistant Professor of English at Sewanee (The University of the South). Her current book project, Consuming Traditions, explores the centrality of commodified nostalgia in early twentieth-century British culture.

JONATHAN GREENBERG is an Assistant Professor at Montclair State University. He has published work on Salman Rushdie and Shakespeare and is completing a book about modernism and cruelty.

SCOTT A. COHEN is an Assistant Professor at Stonehill College, where he teaches postcolonial and twentieth-century British literature. His work has recently appeared in Mfs: Modern Fiction Studies and minnesota review. He is currently completing a study of the aesthetics and politics of movement and mobility in modern fiction and empire.

RAVIT REICHMAN is on a postdoctoral fellowship at Amherst College and assumes a position as Assistant Professor of English at Brown University in fall 2003-04.