

MIND TO MIND

Creative writing that explores the abstract side of our profession and our lives

Stephen T. Harvey, M.D., Editor

Lumbar Puncture

Nisa Malli

Present your spine to the resident and his audience of almost-doctors, next year's earnest needlewielders, sweet-faced believers in science, interns here to learn the precise point of entry for a surface wound. Percutaneous means through the skin but this is bone-deep, not puncture but punch, more pain than most of them will know in their lives of prescriptive call and answer. The doctors are more scared than you. Things can happen at the blind head of a needle, in the laying of hands, in an open-faced excavation. The interns race each other to name the risks: headaches, herniation, hematomas, tonsillar descent. This is how they find your fused lumbar—three tries in, the topical worn off, the experts unsure why you're resisting being pinned—here is the cause of your shallow grand pli , your unwillingness to be bent like a bird's wing.

This poem is one of the finalists of ANESTHESIOLOGY's 2019 annual creative writing competition, The Letheon. malli.nisa@gmail.com.

Accepted for publication March 9, 2020. Published online first on April 3, 2020.

Permission to reprint granted to the American Society of Anesthesiologists, Inc. by copyright author/owner. Anesthesiology 2020; 132:1586. DOI: 10.1097/ALN.0000000000003297