Life in a Moment

Nathaniel J. Brown, M.D., Ph.D.

I learned to diagnose,
to salve suffering,
or at least attempt it.
I tried to console
when medicine could not heal, and when it could, too.

Each day added
another petiole,
a shoot or two,
sometimes even a leaf.
I grew slowly,
case by case.

The years elided
one into the next and life passed all but unwitnessed until a glimpse of cast-off photographs at the back of a forgotten drawer

awakened me with a jolt.
How did my spouse live when I was still waiting for life to begin?

Now on the cusp of adulthood, my daughter's eyes from well over a decade ago catch mine. Playful, carefree—an intimate moment with passing friends.

She was small.
I still feel young,
but the thinning leaves of my own canopy herald the coming autumn.
How can the journey be so far spent?
