A 63-year-old woman developed right hydrothorax caused by central venous catheter malpositioning. The catheter penetrated the right subclavian artery and entered the pleural space (Fig. 1). The removal of the catheter caused massive bleeding and subsequent haemodynamic instability. A self-expanding stent was inserted into the penetrated right subclavian artery (Fig. 2).