

Acknowledgments

We are grateful to our colleague Alan Mislove, who hosted and provided us access to the Twitter data that made this work possible.

A wonderful group of graduate and undergraduate students helped us with our work. Research assistants Ryan Gallagher and Devin Gaffney helped with data collection and analysis. Gregory Palermo assisted with literature collection. Sonia Banaszczyk was instrumental in searching for literature, locating media sources, and assisting with the general organizing of the project in its early stages. Kristen Miller was an important editor who also assisted in literature collection and synthesis in later stages of the project.

We would like to thank all the people whose voices, images, and videos contributed to the conversations we chronicle in this book. We would especially like to thank our hashtag activist contributors, including Genie Lauren, for her powerful and moving foreword, along with Wagatwe Wanjuki, Jamie Nesbitt Golden, DiDi Delgado, Janet Mock, and Jason Ross, whose commentary you will find within chapters. Their hashtag activism inspired us and made us want to tell the stories herein.

We are grateful for the funding and equipment we received in support of this project from several Northeastern University units, including the NU Lab for Texts, Maps, and Networks, the College of Arts, Media, and Design, and the Global Resilience Institute, and from the NVIDIA Corporation. We are also thankful for the collaborative writing space we were able to utilize in Northeastern University's Program for Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies and the Network Science Institute. Finally, we appreciate the immense amount of feedback we received on this project over the years from research conference audiences, colleagues, mentors, and the manuscript's reviewers and editors.

Last but certainly not least, we thank our families and friends, who have supported this work for many years, tolerated our excessive time on Twitter, and given us the encouragement we needed to see this project through.
