The Lewis Henry Morgan Lectures of 2013 were given just a few weeks before the birth of my twins, Linh and Koos, and are thus indelibly connected in my mind to that joyful event. I deeply appreciate the opportunity to organize my thoughts on the importance of comparison in anthropology and on the unique contribution of anthropology to the social sciences. Tom Gibson extended the original invitation to give the lectures on comparison, and he, Robert Foster, and the rest of the Anthropology Department at the University of Rochester have been extremely welcoming and supportive. Magnus Fiskesjö from Cornell University and Joanne Waghorne and Gareth Fisher from Syracuse University were among the specialists invited to comment on my presentations. Graduate students from the University of Rochester, Columbia University, Cornell University, and the University of Chicago also participated in the discussion. I have greatly benefited from their contributions.

Parts of the book have also been presented to audiences at Minzu University in Beijing, Yunnan Academy of Social Sciences in Kunming, the University of Cambridge, the University of Chicago, the National University of Singapore, Boston University, and the New School for Social Research in New York. I want to thank the participants in these discussions for their comments. An earlier version of chapter 2 appeared in Social Compass 59, no. 2 (June 2012). A special thanks goes to Professor Wu Da, at Minzu University, who has been my host and guide on a number of occasions. I have been involved in a number of larger comparative projects, one of which is the comparative study of religion in Asian cities (Mumbai, Singapore, Shanghai, and Seoul), which was partly supported by a grant from the Korean Academy.

I have been fortunate to have had many conversations on the topic of the book with the extraordinary group of scholars that is collected at the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity in Göttingen. I want to single out Nate Roberts for his generous, scholarly, and always extremely helpful advice. Also I want to thank Steve Vertovec, my codirector at the Max Planck Institute, whose collegial presence has in many ways enabled me to do my work. In Göttingen and elsewhere (Singapore, Xiamen), Kenneth Dean has given me the benefit of his immense scholarship and equally valuable friendship. Chris Fuller, an old friend, has gone over the text and has pointed out several deficiencies and problems. I am very grateful for the time he spent on it, although I have not been able to answer everything satisfactorily.

At Duke University Press the book was read by two anonymous reviewers who have given me extremely helpful and generous comments. Ken Wissoker steered the process in a very friendly and efficient manner. The final production of the book was helped by my secretaries, Jie Zhang and Julia Müller.

This book could not have been written without my wife, Tam Ngo, who has introduced me to many aspects of social life in Southeast and East Asia that I reflect on in this book. I am deeply grateful for her presence in my life.
