

Acknowledgments

It is rare to associate a conference with a good fortune. For most of us, traveling for conferences has become not only a banality but also a burden. However, there are some precious moments in one's academic history that yield unexpected consequences. In 1994, a conference in which I participated in Honolulu, Hawaii, at the East-West Center, was such a moment. I owe special thanks to Dru Gladney for inviting me. I was part of a panel on secularism, a subject at that time still very marginal, even for this conference. Rajeev Bhargava, Charles Taylor, and I were the three speakers on the panel. The conference proved to be the beginning of a very fruitful collaboration. During all these years, in spite of geographical distances, we succeeded in establishing a dialogue, with the help of an extra-institutional platform provided by the Center for Transnational Cultural Studies and the journal Public Culture. Ben Lee, Dilip Gaonkar, Craig Calhoun, Michael Warner, and Ackbar Abbas made possible this journey toward uncharted paths of thinking and unconventional ways of exchange. Themes around public sphere, secularism, and alternative modernities brought different people from different continents together. I was lucky to be part of these circles and to share my thoughts in regard to Europe and Turkey. Working on a series of paradoxical figures and formations, secularism and sexuality, Islam and visibility, public sphere and intimacy, I was struggling for readings of modernity both from within and from the “non west.” I was fortunate to have this comradeship.

x My annual seminar, at École des hautes études en sciences sociales in Paris since 2001, constituted another circle, with my graduate students and colleagues, for exploring the emergence of the question of Islam in secular France.

Some of the chapters were based on the research results of my European-scale project, “EuroPublicIslam: Islam in the making of a European Public Sphere.” Awarded an Advanced Grant for exceptional established research leaders, the EuroPublicIslam project has received funding from the European Research Council under the European Community’s Seventh Framework Programme from the end of 2008 to March 2013 (FP7/2007–2013/Grant Agreement no. 230244). My special thanks go to the European Research Council for the financial support it provided.

Some of the chapters have been published in different journals and edited volumes. I am grateful to Duke University Press for giving me the opportunity to bring together many of the articles on secularism in a collected volume. I benefited greatly from the remarks of the readers to improve the framework and to reorganize the content. An earlier version of chapter 2 was published under the title “European Self-Presentations and Narratives Challenged by Islam: Secular Modernity in Question,” in Decolonising European Sociology: Transdisciplinary Approaches, edited by Encarnación Gutiérrez-Rodríguez, Manuela Boatca, and Sérgio Costa (Ashgate, 2010). Chapter 3 is a revised version of “Manifestations of the Religious-Secular Divide: Self, State, and the Public Sphere,” published in Comparative Secularism in a Global Age, edited by Linell E. Cady and Elizabeth Shakman-Hurd (Palgrave Macmillan, 2010). Chapter 4 is an expanded version of “The Civilizational, Spatial, and Sexual Powers of the Secular,” published in Varieties of Secularism in a Secular Age, edited by Michael Warner, Jonathan Vanantwerpen, and Craig Calhoun (Harvard University Press, 2010). Chapter 5 is an updated version of “Gendered Nature of the Public Sphere,” published in Public Culture 10, no. 1 (1997). Chapter 6 was initially published in Public Culture 14, no. 1 (2002). Chapter 7 was first published in Cultural Politics 5, no. 3 (2009). And chapter 8 is based on an earlier version of “Europe’s Encounter with Islam: What Future?” published in Constellations 13, no. 2 (2006).

I express my gratitude to Zehra Cunillera, my PhD student at EHESS, assistant and team member of my EuroPublicIslam Project, who contributed to the editorial preparation, updating the empirical data as well as bibliographical sources.