

Acknowledgments

I came to this project from several different angles and avenues, different mediums, genres, and theoretical points of view. All have had their human guideposts and beacons. All have brought me to this place. The Repeating Body began in the African American Studies Department and the American Studies Program at Yale University. My dissertation committee had much to contend with as I moved closer and closer to the end of the project. Their grace and consistency made a difficult task that much easier. My dissertation chair, Robert Burns Stepto, is the epitome of exceptional humanity: a wonderful scholar, a probing and exacting adviser, an exuberant teacher, and a flawless writer. He gave me poetry at Yale, and I am not soon to forget what that means. The scope of this project is a testament to his interest, patience, and dedication. Laura Wexler's insight and attention to detail allowed the project to reach its fullness. Matthew Frye Jacobson provided the steady pace and encouragement I needed and will always remember. I thank you all for your patience and hope this book is a small token of my appreciation.

My time at Yale brought me many gifts, most in the form of friendship and collaboration. Brandi Hughes, Kaysha Corinealdi, Lyneise Williams, Nicole N. Ivy, Robin Bernstein, Qiana Robinson-Whitted, Heather Andrea Williams, Sarah Haley, Courtney J. Martin, Tisha Hooks, Laura Grappo, Dara Orenstein, Megan Glick, Erin D. Chapman, Lara Langer Cohen, Shana L. Redmond, and G. Melíssa Garcia—I want to thank you for your individual and collective brilliance, the multiple times you have each saved me from myself, and the future we have before us. My conversations with Erin D. Chapman consist of both laughter and intense concern for the future of black feminism in the academy. I want to thank her for an unrelenting code of honor, which I hope to one day emulate. Lara Langer Cohen has had my full and complete admiration since we shared a booth on a train from Durham, England, to London. I thank her for those important moments we contemplate our academic lives in an off-the-beaten-path café. I have G. Melíssa Garcia to thank for our continued (and continuing) conversations about our interlocking interests in gender studies and visual culture, and Kaysha Corinealdi for the import of thinking diasporically at all times.

At Rice University I was given the opportunity to pursue research and writing at my own pace, supported by a humanities postdoctoral fellowship at the Center for the Study of Women, Gender, and Sexuality. Rosemary Hennessy and Lora Wildenthal made my time there an intellectual joy. I will be eternally grateful for the time I spent there and the work it has produced. My sincere thanks to Helena Michie, Betty Joseph, José Aranda, and Kirsten Osher. I was especially lucky to be a part of a group of humanities postdoctoral fellows invested in the preservation of both research and sanity. Mary Helen Dupree, Voichita Nachescu, Gordon Hughes, and Jeanne Scheper were my entrée to both Houston and a writing group that rotated from café to café throughout the city and created a camaraderie I can only hope will find a way to continue.

I have had the great fortune to be mentored by Carla Kaplan, who leads by exuberant example. Her dedication has enriched this project, and I am fortunate to have her encouragement and advice. Elizabeth Maddock Dillon and Nicole N. Aljoe share my concern for all things transatlantic, literary, and visual. I hope our conversations continue and become ever more expansive. Elizabeth Dillon introduced this project to Duke University Press, and for this she has my enduring thanks. I thank Marina Leslie for craft-influenced kindness, laughter, and wit.

I want to acknowledge the many people whose work, time, and mentoring have been instrumental to my scholarship and the way I am thinking about my work in its present manifestation. Ann duCille, Junia Ferreira Furtado, Thadious Davis, Alicia Schmidt Camacho, Jennifer DeVere Brody, Shawn Michelle Smith, Vera Wells, Wai Chee Dimock, Jennifer L. Morgan, Paul Gilroy, O. Hugo Benavides, Lloyd Pratt, and Christina Sharpe—thank you for the many gifts I have received from you. Lisa Cartwright has made mentoring a mission statement, full of genuine interest and enthusiasm. For Saidiya Hartman in particular, I want you to know that I have taken your words and your deeds as a cartography of the life of the mind that I am still mapping out, slowly.

My research has been supported by the Mellon-Mays Foundation; the Center for the Study of Women, Gender, and Sexuality at Rice University; the Woodrow Wilson Foundation; the Pembroke Center for Research and Teaching on Women at Brown University; the Ruth Landes Memorial Grant (the Reed Foundation); and the Gilder Lehrman Center for the Study of Slavery, Resistance and Abolition at Yale University. I have appreciated the time, the resources, and the conversations afforded me by the generosity I found at each of these institutions. A portion of the first chapter of this book was published as an essay in the fall 2007 issue of wsq. I thank the Feminist Press for allowing me the opportunity to deepen my engagement with the essay in this book. Elizabeth Ault, Sara Leone, and Ken Wissoker at Duke University Press have my profound appreciation and thanks for a process that was efficient, smooth, and utterly civilized. I thank the readers at Duke (both known and unknown) for their interventions and thoughtful comments on the book. This is a stronger project because of your serious engagement with it.

In Boston I was exceptionally fortunate to be a part of the New England Black Studies Collective. I am humbled by the friendships that began there—with Aliyyah Abdur-Rahman, Alisa Braithwaite, Monica White Ndounou, Sam Vasquez, Stéphanie Larrieux, and Sandy Alexandre (“dance, dance”)—and am blessed to continue to know you. Marcia Chatelain, Samantha A. Noel, and Shirley Carrie Hartman are the gifts that keep on giving, and I thank them for that. I have known Shirley Carrie since we were both undergraduates at Queens College, and our fifteen-year-old friendship is still blossoming. Caroline Light is a trooper, a guidepost, and a friend. This work is enriched by the members of The Dark Room: Race and Visual Culture Studies Seminar, a group of scholars who have elegantly altered the trajectory of my thinking. For this I am forever in your debt. My graduate students teach me every day how to imagine my work through their engagement with it, and I remain impressed by the stunning intellectual projects they produce as they move through the program.

In Providence (the city, that is) my good fortune has been good company. Tanya Sheehan and Daniel Harkett, Toby Sisson, Françoise Hamlin, Esther Jones, Patricia A. Lott, Karida Brown, Rebecca Louise Carter, Lara

Stein Pardo, and Courtney J. Martin make an already creative and vibrant city so much more than that. May we continue to find pleasure and solace in this space of boundless energy.

My success as a scholar is a testament to my family and their collective dedication to me. My father is the man I most admire, and in more ways than I can count he makes me proud to do this work. My sister Yolanda is my best friend and the mother of three of my favorite people in the world. Thank you for always reminding me that there is a larger purpose to this work.

I have Vanessa M. Liles and Nadine Adjoa Smith to thank for my continued attempts at rooted activism, Trimiko Melancon for unreasonable laughter and bawdy behavior, and Sarah Haley (sahaley) for determined and consistent humanistic endeavors (to think of others more often than I think of myself).

I thank Adebola Asekun for decades-long care and affection. And for patience.

Finally, this book was written to music. From the first few scrambled thoughts on slips of paper to the crazed final moments of revision, we have formed a rhythmic synthesis—a melodious understanding carved out of easy isolation and submersion: the music, the book, and me. I want to thank the gifted artists who have made this journey image-rich, provocative, and eclectic. My appreciation goes out to Roberta Flack, Otis Redding, Nina Simone, Marisa Monte, John Coltrane, Africando, the Roots, Amy Winehouse, Alice Smith, Anthony Hamilton (dap, Vanessa), Concha Buika, Maxwell, Janelle Monàe (turn thanks, Shana), Zap Mama, Rokia Traoré, Leela James, Aretha Franklin, Mary J. Blige, Mos Def, Meshell Ndegeocello, Lila Downs and Susana Baca (gracias, Melissa), Phyllis Hyman, Marvin Gaye and Beres Hammond (always, daddy), Fela Kuti, Damien Rice, Lhasa de Sela (obrigada, Kaysha), Sade, and Cassandra Wilson. I absolutely could not have done it without you.
