

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

We begin by thanking Megan M. Wood: there are no words to convey our gratitude. Simply put, Megan was a lifesaver. She stepped in when we absolutely could not have managed without her. The timely and efficient completion of this volume is due to Megan's hard work and dedication. She was tireless in her devotion to the project, putting up with our endless last-minute rush requests and doing everything with good humor and the kind of efficiency we fear we will not encounter again. Amazingly, she did this because of her belief in the project and her incredible desire to learn, since we were unable to provide any material compensation. Amid all the busywork, Megan was also able to parse through complex theory and see the forest for the trees, helping guide us when we got lost. Her mark is on every page of this work.

We would like to thank Kelly Gates for her wonderful suggestions and insights in a review of an early draft of the manuscript — her input shaped the project. We are also grateful to the anonymous reviewer who provided many invaluable suggestions for the work. Courtney Berger, our editor at Duke, has shepherded us through this process, always supportive, amazingly encouraging and wise, and, of course, patient. To Erin Hanas, the editorial associate at Duke, we are grateful for always keeping on top of things, and particularly, in the final stages, for working tirelessly to make sure this project was completed in a timely fashion. And, of course, we are hugely indebted to our contributors, whose brilliance shapes this volume. They are real troopers for putting up with our repeated requests for revisions (big and small): you are an amazing bunch.

It is with a tremendous debt of gratitude that I (Shoshana) thank my coeditor and friend Rachel. During the last year of our work, I faced a particularly challenging time in my own life. When I turned to Rachel for help, she gave tirelessly of her own time and compassionate energy, taking over tasks when I could not do them, completing them with a generosity of spirit and kindness and with the brilliance for which her scholarship is known. This edited book would not exist without her many and profound interventions. In addition, Rachel is one of the most thoughtful and innovative thinkers that I know — the chance to speak with her about the many ideas in this project has been an incredibly rich intellectual experience. A special thanks also to Simone Browne, who helped greatly with much of the early thinking and ideas for this collection.

As always, I (Shoshana) remain well supported by a generous and generative set of thinkers at my home institution at the University of Ottawa. First and foremost, I would like to thank my colleague and B.F.F. Michael Orsini (and his family: Victoria Gordon Orsini, Emma Orsini, and Lucca Orsini). It actually brings tears to my eyes to think back on the many ways that he has supported me both personally and professionally. He remains one of the most widely read, intellectually stimulating, brilliant people that I know, and it was conversations with him that fueled many of the suggestions that I had early on when Rachel and I were writing the introduction. In addition, with him as chair, the Institute of Feminist and Gender Studies at the University of Ottawa is a truly wonderful place to work. His intersectional feminist analysis and his admirable leadership and comradeship have made coming into work a joy. Just as my pal Michael has changed my life, the same goes for my pals Miranda Brady, Jena McGill, and Cynthia Misener. I simply don't know what I'd do without them. They are rich sources of scholarly inspiration, but they also provided the incredibly depthful friendship I needed to do any work at all. So did Sarah Berry, Meghan Dailey, Jesse Dangerously, Danielle Dinovelli-Lang, Pat Gentile, Sarah Kennell, Jackie Kennelly, Ummni Khan, Evelyn Maeder, Mireille McLaughlin, and my dear "goddessmother" Diana Majury. As always, for Helen Kang and Shanta Varma and my mothers, Sanda Rodgers and Sheila McIntyre, without whom life would simply not exist as I know it. And for my truly wonderful partner Lise Richard, whose scintillating and brilliant presence has completely transformed my life in all the loveliest ways possible. There are no words to convey the absolutely huge depth of my love and appreciation for these five members of my family. I would also like to cite my other generous feminist colleagues and friends, including Corrie Scott, Mythili Rajiva, and Kathryn Trevenen, who have shaped and continue to shape my thinking, including about the ways that we might continue to push intersectional feminist analysis. Finally, I'd especially like to thank my students both past and present, who furnished me with incredible ideas for thinking about surveillance intersectionally: Caitlin Campisi and Dayna Prest (who both still understand more about methodology than I do), Hayley Crooks, JoAnne Gordon, Jami McFarland, Brittany Neron, Celeste Orr, Chaya Porter, Victoria Sands, Jenna Tenn-Yuk, and, of course, Amanda Watson. These are among our finest feminist thinkers, as well as some of the kindest and most generous and generative scholars and activists I know. Although it sounds like a truism, they actually teach me so much more than I teach them.

I (Rachel) am honored to be a part of this project, which was Shoshana's baby—I came along for the ride. Working with Shoshana was the kind of collaborative, productive, and generative experience scholars hope for. She welcomed my input, letting me make an imprint on the work, and eventually encouraging me to take the lead. Her grace and generosity of spirit guided the entire project. Shoshana's work has always been a wonderful inspiration for my own work: I am lucky to share an author line with her.

I (Rachel) am indebted to my professional home, the Department of Communication at the University of South Florida, for the support provided for this project through course releases and research assistants, thanks to my department chairs, Kenneth Cissna and later Carolyn Ellis, who believed in the value of the project. A word of thanks to my friends in Tampa who sustained me with endless laughter and good times, enabling me to get back to the work: Julie Alexander, Warren L. Rose, Chaim Noy, Ruthie Brathwaite, Ambar Basu, Mahuya Pal, and Mariaelena Bartesaghi. Grateful to Kent A. Ono, who inspires and provides wisdom every step of the way, and to Marlene Kadar, the first to insist I begin this academic journey, and who has been there at every turn, beaming her encouragement. Finally, words fail to express my appreciation for my mother Debby Dubrofsky, who is the most loving, vibrant, and lively cheerleader one can hope for, and for my little sister, Seiyan Yang, whose emergence into young adulthood inspires and reminds me why I do what I do: to impress her.
