

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

From first fancy to final form, fabulous facilitators and formidable sparring partners have been highly influential for my attempt at serving up the Hitchcock brand. Lynn Spigel got me under way when she invited me to teach a Hitchcock seminar at Northwestern University. Throughout, she has acted as a veritable champion for the project. Ken Wissoker at Duke University Press discreetly steered the process from first pitch to book design with unfailing elegance. For the masterminding of the final hands-on process and copyediting, I'm beyond grateful for having had Liz Smith in my corner. Her unfailing sense of style and graceful attention to matters big and small are nothing short of superb. During the cumbersome process of securing rights for the book's figures, Elizabeth Ault was a rock when I needed one.

The resources at Northwestern University, especially the efficient Interlibrary Loan Division and the many digital resources on campus, have been essential for my research. In the triangulation of Hitchcock beyond Evanston, the fantastic staff of the Margaret Herrick Library at the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, especially Barbara Hall (during her tenure) and Faye Thompson, have been model archivists—as always—and the New York Public Library, particularly the cheerful young staff in the Microforms Reading Room, as well as their colleagues at the branch for the Performing Arts at Lincoln Center, went beyond the call of duty to gratify my scholarly appetite.

From my perspective, no one can write a film book without regularly consulting Ned Comstock at the Cinematic Arts Library at the University of Southern California. He cannot be praised enough for pertinently sharing his vast knowledge of the collections and film culture at large. I have also benefited immensely from his colleague Dace Taube and her unrivaled command of the regional history collections at USC. Francisca Folch at the Harry Ransom Center, University of Texas at Austin, patiently helped me to dig out rare Hitchcockiana—and not only from the Selznick Collection. Jane Branfield at the Roald Dahl Museum and Story Centre in Buckinghamshire, England, generously gave me access to unique source materials from the production of “Lamb to the Slaughter,” the Hitchcock franchise’s most famous teleplay. The knowledgeable staff of the Prints and Photographs Division at the Library of Congress maximized my payoff from the wealth of imagery in the collections. At the British Film Institute, Dave McCall went out of his way to assist me in ransacking the rich collection of Hitchcock stills. Michael Shulman at Magnum Photos worked miracles in the late stages of photograph hunting. I am particularly indebted to Howard Mandelbaum and his colleagues at Photofest for their willingness to take even the most eccentric requests in stride.

Will Schmenner, during his time at the Block Museum, Evanston, commissioned my very first draft for this project in conjunction with an exhibition in 2007. His infectious enthusiasm and energy were important for the future of the project. I’m also much indebted to Jeffrey Sconce, Northwestern University; Bart van der Gaag, Stockholm University; and Jan-Christopher Horak and Mark Quigley, both at the University of California, Los Angeles, Film and Television Archive, for all kinds of assistance and support.

Input from Steve Wilder was key in the early stages of drafting, while Anitra Grisales proved absolutely indispensable down the stretch. I cannot thank my readers enough; one of them, especially, exerted a truly formative influence during the manuscript’s revision phase. Jakob Olsson has lent his professional eyes and dexterous hands to optimize the visual materials. The Lauritzen Foundation for Film Historical Research, Stockholm, has once again provided much-needed funding.

I want to express my sincere appreciation to Norman Lloyd, the Hitchcock franchise’s stellar producer, actor, and director, for inviting me to his home and eloquently discussing his work. Similarly, James (Jim) Allardice took time to talk to me about his father, James B. (Jimmie) Allardice, and to ferret out materials from the family vaults bearing on the ingenious scripting of Hitchcock’s on-tube segments and more.

If Marina Dahlquist is fed up with Hitchcock reflections, she lovingly manages to turn them into creative observations and astute advice. Daily life apart, joint research trips for our separate projects have turned into marvelous adventures irrespective of the long hours in the archives.

This is for my late father, Bertil, and my still spry mother, Sonja. Without them . . .
