Louise Young has been a critical, yet compassionate, mentor without whom this project could not have been completed. Her support and encouragement as I studied under her guidance at New York University enabled me to take lines of flight that I would not have been allowed to make under a less trusting advisor. Harry Harootunian's enthusiastic and critical engagement with social theory as well as historical texts continues to be a constant source of inspiration and challenge to me. His support for this work has been an invaluable source of encouragement. I would also like to thank my dissertation readers at New York University, Rebecca Karl, Joanna Waley-Cohen, and Tom Looser, for taking the time to provide me with critical feedback, which has continued to inform this manuscript during its long revision process. Katsuhiko Endo provided valuable advice and focus for this project during its formative period.

The bulk of the research for this manuscript was supported by the Fulbright Foundation, which allowed me to spend 2002–4 at Waseda University. My experience in Japan was greatly enriched by the kindness of Okamoto Kōichi, Umemori Naoyuki, Gabe Masao, and all of the scholars and students at Waseda's Institute for Ryukyuan and Okinawan Studies. Their intellectual generosity and friendship helped me get through the long days of document gathering and translations. The graduate students that I encountered at Waseda, most notably Takemasa Ando, provided great conversation and camaraderie during this time. I am also grateful to the scholars at the Hōsei University Okinawa Kenkyūjo for inviting me into their study groups and sharing many stories of Okinawa's earlier scholars with me. I would be glad to make a contribution that equaled just a fraction of what they have accomplished to enrich the field of Okinawan studies.

My colleagues and students in the History and Asian Studies Departments at Furman University have provided me with numerous opportunities to share my work on Okinawa both inside and outside the classroom. I would especially like to thank Erik Ching and Lane Harris for reading large portions of the manuscript and providing valuable feedback. The institutional support that Furman has provided over the years has enabled me to travel to Okinawa to conduct supplementary research as the project has developed. In addition to the Dean's Office, the Humanities Development Fund and the Research and Professional Growth Fund have provided valuable resources that have aided in the completion of this project.

Over the years, I have been given the opportunity to present my work to diverse audiences at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, the International Symposium on Okinawa Studies, the Association for Asian Studies Conference, and the Historical Materialism Conference. The critical feedback that I have received at these venues has transformed this project into one that is more squarely situated in Marxist theory. Along the way, my new friends in the Okinawa studies field, Chris Nelson, Tze Loo, and Uechi Satoko, have provided important intellectual stimulation and opportunities for discussion that enabled me to sharpen my focus on the theoretical and political underpinnings of this work. I would like to thank the anonymous readers for Duke University Press and Ken Wissoker, its editorial director, whose critical feedback and suggestions have pushed me to engage more explicitly with fields outside of the narrow boundaries of Okinawan studies.

I am also grateful for the opportunity that Nagahara Yutaka and Adachi Mariko gave me to present my work at Ochanomizu University in the fall of 2013. This was a challenging experience that reinforced my conviction of the need to engage the broader field of critical political economy when writing about Okinawa. A year at Dōshisha University's Graduate School of Global Studies, funded by the Fulbright Foundation, allowed me to put the finishing touches on the manuscript. During that time, Tomiyama Ichirō generously offered me friendship, a space to present my work, an opportunity to study with other scholars and students, and encouragement to carry on with the project. A Japanese Studies Travel Grant from the Association for Asian Studies Northeast Asia Council also provided generous support for this project by allowing me to travel to Okinawa for supplementary research one summer. The librarians and archivists at the University of the Ryūkyūs Library, University of Hawaii Hamilton Library, Okinawa Prefectural Archives, Naha City Museum of History, and National Diet Library, especially Tomita Chinatsu, Tokiko Bazzell, and Kaz Nakamoto, helped me locate essential sources and provided much-needed help obtaining copyright permissions.

I would like to express my thanks to my mother and father, who were silent and gentle witnesses as I struggled to complete this project. Their encouragement provided me with the energy and strength to continue even when the end seemed very far away. Finally, I would like to thank Paul and Karl, who have provided me with love and laughter every day.
