

Acknowledgments

The origins of this book date to my time in the University of Chicago's Department of English, and the manuscript benefited tremendously from the input of James F. Lastra and W. J. T. Mitchell, as well as the inspiration of the late Miriam Hansen, whose example as a teacher and interlocutor I do my best to draw upon. I owe a primary debt of gratitude to friends in Chicago who simultaneously inhabited the worlds of music and academia: John Corbett, Terri Kapsalis, Pamela Robertson Wojcik, and Rick Wojcik.

Much of what I have learned about this book's subject comes from friends whom I know through music: Noël Akchoté, Andrea Belfi, Marie-Pierre Bonniol, Ken Brown, Anthony Burr, Tony Conrad, Charles Curtis, Drew Daniel, Claudia Gonson, Christoph Gurk, Mats Gustafsson, Nick Hallett, Jeff Hunt, Nina Katchadourian, Dan Koretzky, Lawrence Kumpf, Zach Layton, Pierre-Yves Macé, Hannah Marcus, John McEntire, Brian McMahan, Rick Moody, Rian Murphy, Albert Oehlen, Will Oldham, Pauline Oliveros, Jim O'Rourke, Dan Osborn, Stefano Pilia, Stephen Prina, Quentin Rollet, Atsushi Sasaki, M. C. Schmidt, Mayo Thompson, Taku Unami, Nikos Veliotis, Britt Walford, Tom Watson, Keith Fullerton Whitman, Nate Wooley, and Otomo Yoshihide.

In 2005 I began teaching in Brooklyn College's Conservatory of Music and graduate program in Performance and Interactive Media Arts (PIMA). I'd like to thank my colleagues Amnon Wolman, John J. A. Jannone, Jennifer McCoy, Helen Richardson, Nancy Hager, Bruce MacIntyre, and Maria Conelli for their commitment to team teaching, innovative pedagogy, and interdisciplinary education. At Brooklyn College, it has been a pleasure teaching and learning alongside Julie Agoos, Ray Allen, Chloë Bass, Kara Bohnenstiel, Douglas Cohen, D. Edward Davis, Jason Eckardt, Douglas Geers, Mona Hadler, Mobina Hashmi, Stephanie Jensen-Moulton, Ben Lerner, Yoni Niv, Zachary Seldess, and Jeff Taylor, and all of the PIMA students, as well as the staff of the Wolfe Institute and the H. Wiley Hitchcock Institute for Studies in American Music. At the CUNY Graduate Center I benefited from participating in the interdisciplinary seminars organized by Claire Bishop and Lindsay Caplan.

Much of the material in this book has been presented in preliminary versions at the Experience Music Project's Pop Conference. Thanks go to its founder, Eric Weisbard, for encouraging me to present work there, even as this work stands at some remove from popular music studies. From its beginning, I've enjoyed the Pop Conference as a meeting point of academics and critics where, to put it broadly, popular-press critics are encouraged to research in greater depth and academics are encouraged to communicate their ideas in a more compelling fashion. I've had the good fortune to receive all manner of feedback from Pop Conference participants. In this time of diminishing venues for music criticism in print, the Pop Conference has given numerous music writers the impetus to go long and deep. Work from Records Ruin the Landscape has been presented at the University of Chicago, the University of Chicago Center in Paris, the School of the Art Institute of Chicago, the University of Toronto, UC San Diego, SUNY Purchase, Brooklyn College, and the CUNY Graduate Center, and I thank the organizers of these events.

I am grateful to the following editors, publishers, and translators: Ken Wissoker, Liz Smith, and Jade Brooks (Duke University Press), Karl Bruckmaier (Süddeutsche Zeitung), Ray Allen and Jeff Taylor (American Music Review), Steve Erickson (Black Clock), Pablo Lafuente (Afterall), Julian Weber (Die Tageszeitung), and Krystian Woznicki (Berliner Gazette). An excerpt from the chapter "Remove the Records from Texas: Online Resources and Impermanent Archives" appeared in American Music Review. This book was supported by a PSC-CUNY 38 Research Award and an artist's grant from the Foundation for Contemporary Arts.

Thanks are due to the book's gracious interview subjects: the late Derek Bailey, David Behrman, Tony Conrad, John Corbett, Kenneth Goldsmith, Lisa Kahlden, Terri Kapsalis, and Keith Rowe. At a crucial point in this book's development, Daniel Pearce appeared out of thin air and volunteered as a research assistant. For their assistance with permissions for images and for the book's epigraph, I thank John Ashbery, Karen Brookman-Bailey, Gene Caprioglio, Emanuele Carcano, Brunhild Ferrari, Henry Flynt, Marco Fusinato, Olivier Garros, Kenneth Goldsmith, D. J. Hoek, Lisa Kahlden, David Kermani, Jak Kilby, Laura Kuhn and the John Cage Trust, Alan Licht, Gregory MacAyeal, Barbara Moore, Rebecca Moore, C. F. Peters Corporation, Eddie Prévost, Archie Rand, and Suzanna Tamminen and Wesleyan University Press. I also thank Anna Reinhardt for granting permission to quote from an unpublished letter from Ad Reinhardt to John Cage.

Many of the ideas developed in this book took shape through conversations and communications with the following individuals: Jonah Bokaer, Cosima von Bonin, Angela Bulloch, Jeff Clark, Nicolas Collins, Augusto Contento, Christoph Cox, Tony Creamer, Kevin Dettmar, Diedrich Diederichsen, David Duncan, Noam M. Elcott, Brunhild Ferrari, Luc Ferrari, Josh Goldfein, Giancarlo Grande, Maxime Guitton, Brian Harnetty, Susan Howe, Clark Johnson, T. R. Johnson, Devin Johnston, Ken Katkin, Seth Kim-Cohen, Philip Leventhal, Alvin Lucier, Lou Mallozzi, Anthony McCall, Diane Pecknold, Benjamin Piekut, Lorraine Plourde, Ann Powers, Alex Ross, Seth Sanders, Felicity Scott, Barry Shank, Bennett Simpson, Yuval Taylor, Jay Williams, and Kênya Zanatta. I would especially like to thank Cathy Bowman, Branden W. Joseph, and Liz Kotz, who generously read and responded to work in progress.

Closer to the home front, thanks are due to my extraordinarily supportive parents, William and Susan Grubbs, as well as to Ruth and Roger Bowman.

This book is dedicated, with love, to Cathy Bowman and Emmett Bowman-Grubbs.
