

Acknowledgments

Every author owes a debt to the people who have surrounded a work in progress and offered support of an artistic, financial, moral, or psychological nature. This book owes a particularly large set of debts, as it has gestated over such a long period and has come about in large part thanks to the friends and colleagues who urged me to persevere in the face of my perennial excuses and postponements.

First, I would like to thank the circle of friends who have pushed me onward with all the fervor of a coach, mentor, and best friend combined. Without their belief, enthusiasm, and wise counsel, I couldn't have done this. Special thanks, then, for their long-term friendship and wise counsel and professional companionship, to Joan Braderman, Rosa Linda Fre-goso, Martha Gever, Faye Ginsburg, Herman Gray, Bill Horrigan, Kate Horsfield, Lillian Jimenez, Isaac Julien, Judith Mayne, Sheila McLaughlin, Kathy McNicholas, Monica Melamid, Mark Nash, Yvonne Rainer, Carrie Rickey, Tony Safford, Hollis Sigler, Deborah Silverfine, Helga Stephenson, Sharon Thompson, Michelle Yasmine Valladares, and Martella Wilson. Special thanks to my designated elder, Loretta Szeliga, who never stopped inquiring after this manuscript even when many of fainter heart might have ceased. I have been blessed with wonderful friends and generous supporters and I owe them these thanks and many more.

Along the way, when I needed help or encouragement, information or practical assistance, there were others who provided all that and more. Thanks to Siew-Hwa Beh, Nancy Bereano, Hali Breindel, Patricia Erens, Marcia Festen, Karola Gramann, Bill Nichols, Sally Potter, Robert Stricker, Lynne Tillman, Warner Wada, Virginia Wright Wexman, Mary Wings, Meg Wolitzer, Elizabeth Young, and Tomas Ybarra-Frausto for their time, conversation, or assistance, and, above all, for the reassurance that this volume ought to see the light of day. At the University of California, Berkeley, my great thanks to my former student Catherine Zimmer for convincing me that her generation has something at stake in the histories told here; to my filmmaking students Cynthia Tsai and Sarah Harbin for reassuring me that a new generation will carry the torch; and to the staff and faculty in the Film Program, and the Rhetoric, Women's Studies, and Undergraduate Interdisciplinary Departments for their collegial support.

Thanks also to the friends, scholars, and editors (including some mentioned above) who read the manuscript when I first submitted it, offered much-needed and welcomed support, and made useful suggestions: Rhona Berenstein, Philip Dodd, Janet Franzendini, Jane Gaines, Mikah Kleit, Willis Regier, Michael Renov, Robert Sklar, and Linda Williams. For their belief in this work and its future, thanks above all to my editor at Duke University Press, Ken Wissoker, and to Richard Morrison.

Finally, there are several people whose material support was so decisive in the realization of this project that they require separate acknowledgment. First, my great thanks to Woody Wickham, who believed in the worth of what I was doing almost before I did and invited me to spend a couple of months at the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation as a Distinguished Visitor. The inestimable leisure of that time allowed me for the first time to break the bonds of journalism and experience the very different feeling of a book's tempo and demands. The early support of the MacArthur staff that attended my reading of a few of the early pieces was invaluable for ensuring the merit of this work for a larger public. Without Woody's generous offer, I might never have started.

Once started, however, I stalled. It is thanks to Faye Ginsburg that I was able to finish. She first invited me to apply to her Center for Media, Culture and History at New York University, where I was selected as a Rockefeller Fellow in the Humanities during the 1995–96 academic year; after my arrival, she and Fred Myers and their daughter Samantha offered much-needed hospitality that went well beyond the call of duty. In addition to the fellowship's financial support, which again offered a refuge from the deadline rituals of journalism, I was thrilled and inspired by the intellectual comradeship that I encountered at NYU. My thanks to the staff of the Center: Barbara Abrash, Sarah Berry, and Ruth VonGoeler for all their assistance during my stay. During my NYU months and the many months since then, I've also benefited from the friendship and humor of my NYU friends Lisa Duggan and José Muñoz.

Special thanks are due to the band of NYU and NYC friends and colleagues who came out on a blizzarding night to hear my sole public reading of this material. In contrast to my initial reluctance to expose this material, I received back an evening of such extraordinary energy, warmth, and enthusiasm that it propelled me to completion during the long months of solitary work that followed. Thank you, then, to Bambi Schieffelin, Wanda Bershen, Shu-Lea Cheang, Laura Cottingham, Charlayne Haynes, Ernie Larson, Sherry Millner, Yvonne Rainer, Sylvie Thouard, Rose Troche, Robin Vaxal, and others already thanked above or below. Thanks, too, to the other members of the queer reading group that met during my year at NYU in stimulating conversation.

Some important debts have been left to the end. Special thanks to Margaret Pavel for her gifts of sanguine courage and her guidance through the minefields of personal obstacles that so often blocked my way. Thanks to Linda Youtt-Schneider for her early assistance in the same direction. And for material assistance on the preparation of this manuscript and its innumerable details, thanks to my assistant, Elizabeth Sanín, for her intelligent optimism and considerable labors.

Finally, thanks to my partner, Lourdes Portillo, and to my stepsons, Antonio, Karim, and Carlos Scarlata, who shared my life throughout my writing of this text and provided a constant spur and challenge to the work that I do. If ideas must be tested to gather strength, then this text owes its muscles to my family.

And to my birth family, thanks as well, for their part in shaping the mind and spirit on which I rely: to my late parents, Abraham and Lillian Rich, my sister Susan Rich, and my sister Cheryl Koeber and her family, my brother-in-law Douglas and my very excellent nephew Zachary.

Finally, lest I or you ever forget, thanks to the filmmakers. Without their work, there would be no subject and far less inspiration.
