This book could not have been written without the intellectual and emotional support of many people both in the United States and in Israel. Susan Gilson Miller was an important source of advice and support during every stage of this project. At Harvard University, Michael Herzfeld, Begona Aretxaga, Mary Steedly, and Arthur Kleinman provided crucial comments, criticisms, and suggestions. I am very grateful to Daniel Boyarin, Faye Ginsburg, Sarah Franklin, Marcia Inhorn, Carmel Shalev, David Golinkin, Helen Epstein, and Madeline Kochen for reading sections of the manuscript and offering invaluable insights. Any sins of commission or omission in the following pages are obviously my own. My new colleagues at Brandeis University have been very supportive. I particularly thank Shulamit Reinhartz, Sylvia Barack Fishman, Helene Greenberg, Sylvia Fuks Fried, Marc Brettler, and Jonathan Sarna. The help, interest, and collegiality of Don Seeman, Adam Weisberg, Samantha King, and Dana Isaacoff were important to me throughout this project. Although Janet Adelman and Ruth Wisse teach literature, not anthropology, their intellectual examples have been very inspiring to me. I thank Florence DeVecchi for making the study of anthropology so interesting to me in the first place.

In Jerusalem, I am very grateful to my friends, particularly Judy Paikin, Gladys Groner, Dani Groner, Tessa Manoim, Dorit Ortal, Susie Schneider, Tali Birkhan, Susan Moser, Renee Goutmann, Batya Kallus, Menachem Kallus, Tslila Zagagi, Yael Shaul, Shosh, Katya, Tamar, and Golda, for their friendship, warmth, and hospitality. They kept me sane, invited me over for delicious meals, and challenged me to think carefully about the many ideas this project generated. Getting to know Dr. Carmel Shalev was one of the great perks of this project, and her extremely generous intellectual input into my early thinking about these ideas was invaluable.

The staff at various hospitals and clinics in Israel were generally very helpful, and this work could not have been completed without their consent and participation. Many of them were also great fun to be with. The women in the “maybebaby” group in Jerusalem cheerfully tolerated my “spying,” as they called it, and it was a pleasure to be part of their ongoing exploration of the dilemmas of childbearing and to share the joy of two pregnant members. The unmarried women I interviewed shared the intimate details of their reproductive lives with me, and I hope I have done credit to their stories. I also thank the many rabbis, librarians, taxi drivers, bus drivers, and others who helped me navigate my way around Israel, both literally and figuratively.

This research was assisted by a grant from the Joint Committee on the Near and Middle East of the Social Science Research Council and the American Council of Learned Societies with funds provided by the U.S. Information Agency. I am also grateful for support from the Center for Jewish Studies at Harvard University, the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture, and the Charlotte Newcombe Doctoral Dissertation Fellowship. Finally, I want to thank the National Foundation for Jewish Culture for awarding this project their 1998 Sidney and Hadassah Musher Publication Prize.

I am very grateful to Ken Wissoker, Rebecca Johns-Danes, and Paula Dragosh at Duke University Press. I also thank Nancy Zibman for preparing the index.

I dedicate this work to my mother with deep gratitude for her unwavering support.
