

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

---

This book is based on fourteen months of field research in Mexico; many more years of experiences with indigenous media across Latin America and in the United States inform my work. My field research was funded by the Social Science Research Council, Fulbright-Hays, and the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research, and the Film and Video Center of the National Museum of the American Indian (NMAI) sponsored several of my trips to media festivals and workshops in Latin America. I want to thank the indigenous media-makers and their supporters, many of whom do not directly appear in this study, for having shared this dynamic arena of social practice with me. Many of the individuals whose voices and projects are included in this book have remained close friends, and I am forever grateful for their trust, openness, and patience while being subject to my inquisitive gaze.

I owe particular debts of gratitude to my academic advisers and colleagues at the Department of Anthropology and the program in Culture and Media at New York University and at NMAI. Fred Myers, Thomas Abercrombie, Jeff Himpele, and in particular, Faye Ginsburg, shepherded my studies and the development of this project in crucial ways. Jeff's invitation to write a short article for American Anthropologist (Worthington 2004) allowed me to begin to envision how my work could reach a broader audience, and Faye's enduring enthusiasm helped me keep the dots of field research, dissertation, manuscript, and social engagement connected and within my reach. Elizabeth Weatherford, head of the Film and Video Center at NMAI, afforded me many unforgettable opportunities to expand my knowledge of indigenous media practices in Mexico (and beyond) and to bring indigenous works from that part of the world into the museum's collection. Collectively Elizabeth, Millie Seubert, Carol Kalafatic, and my coworkers of over seven years at NMAI imparted their deep passion for and knowledge of Native American peoples and cultures to me in daily and meaningful ways. I thank them for sharing their life's work with me and for embracing indigenous mediamakers from Latin America.

The Centro de Investigaciones y Estudios Superiores en Antropología Social-Unidad Istmo, in Oaxaca City, provided important institutional refuge and resources during my field research in 1999 and 2000. Paola Sesia is an extraordinary model of an engaged researcher, and I feel grateful to count her as a friend and colleague. I thank the Center for U.S.-Mexican Studies at the University of California, San Diego, for supporting my writing process with a Research Fellowship, from 2000 through 2001, and a second time with a Visiting Scholar Fellowship, from 2010 through 2011. Working at the center provided an unrivaled mix of intellectual stimulation, support, and friendship during both of my fellowship periods. Emiko Saldívar, Cori Hayden, and Senior Fellow Van Whiting helped me stay on track and enjoy the writing process as the dissertation took shape. More recently, Miles Rodriguez and Lara Braff, who kindly slogged through several versions of various chapters, gave me precise and tremendously helpful comments. Lara, in particular, helped me remain sane and focused as I finished the final draft of my manuscript. Justin Levitt, a research assistant at the center, helped me generate the maps for this book, and Greg Mallinger's steady presence made a group of transients feel settled and organized. Alberto Díaz-Cayeros, the center's director, spread his contagious enthusiasm for research like pixie dust, in the form of spot-on comments and penetrating questions, as he darted from meeting to meeting, airport to airport. And Graciela Platero, director of External Affairs and Fellowship Program Officer (but unofficially the vertebral column and matron) of the center, made everyone feel welcome, purposeful, and connected. Her thirty-year stewardship of the center wrapped up as I finished the manuscript and I know I speak for all my fellow colleagues in wishing her much suerte in her new endeavors. I am also grateful to my colleagues at UCSD's Department of Anthropology and, in particular, to Nancy Postero, whose careful reading and insightful comments of my dissertation and manuscript pushed me to clarify my ideas and believe in my perspective.

Laurel Smith, a cultural geographer at the University of Oklahoma, has been a tremendous source of support in this project. She began her field research on indigenous media in Oaxaca just as I was finishing mine. Though we approach a common subject through different disciplinary lenses, she and I share many positions and conclusions, just as we share a very specific network of friends and colleagues who practice and study indigenous media.

Ken Wissoker, at Duke University Press, with his endlessly supportive energy and positive attitude, saw me through various periods when life's demands and writing were not in sync. I am indebted to him for his patience and belief in the currency of the stories and struggles herein. It has been a lively and positive experience to live under the microscope of the staff at Duke; their careful work and thoughtful interventions have kept me on my toes.

Finally, the depth and resourcefulness of my personal support network of family and friends, new and old, sustained me through research and writing. My mother deserves special mention (don't they all?). She taught me to speak Spanish before I spoke English and kept me close to Mexico, even though I grew up in east Texas at a time when bilingualism was frowned upon as "damaging" to children. Forever critical and quick on the draw, she successfully instilled her "America is a continent—not a country" perspective in all four of her girls.

I thank my husband, Phillip Baltazar, for reminding me that this project is a "get to" not a "have to," for keeping me on track and for providing for us in ways I never dreamed possible. The sustaining smiles and hugs I received from our children, Ricky, Annelies, and Emilia while I began this project are now accompanied by complex conversations about cultural diversity and situated histories. Though I wrote this book with only a few full nights' sleep, my children and their father's daily love and growing understanding of my endeavors have been an endless source of energy. They keep my life in balance.

