

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

From the very beginning, this volume has been a collaborative enterprise. Its origins lie in a Dissertation Proposal Development Seminar sponsored by the Social Science Research Council, which we were privileged to teach in May 2009 in New Orleans and September 2009 in Philadelphia. Funded by the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, these seminars bring together graduate students from disparate fields at the moment when they are first formulating their dissertation topics. Our theme was “Empires of Vision,” and from a very competitive field of applicants, we chose a dozen participants. They exceeded our most exorbitant expectations, and our marathon sessions were wonderfully productive exercises in collaborative intellectual stimulation. Our first expression of gratitude goes to the members of the seminar: Mustafa Avci, an ethnomusicologist from New York University; Jill Campaiola, a media studies student from Rutgers; Josefina de la Maza Chevesich, an art historian from the State University of New York at Stony Brook; Christine DeLucia, an American studies student from Yale; Melissa Heer, an art historian from the University of Minnesota, Twin Cities; Jessica Horton, an art historian from the University of Rochester; Saydia Kamal, an anthropologist from the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill; Andrea Korta, an art historian from the University of California, Santa Barbara; Daegan Miller, a historian from Cornell University; Deniz Turker, an art historian from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Katherine Wiley, an anthropologist from Indiana University, Bloomington; and Marieke Wilson, an anthropologist from the Johns Hopkins University. Keep your eyes out for them; they are all future leaders in their fields. We would also like to thank the SSRC staff, Josh DeWind, Camille Peretz, Emily Burns, and Lauren Shields, for the gracious exercise of their formidable organizational talents.

Our next expression of gratitude goes to David Moshfegh, who took time away from completing his dissertation in the UC Berkeley History Department to do Herculean combat with the multi-headed Hydra who grants permissions for previously published essays and images. Rather than violence, he used tenacity, wit, and charm to obtain what made this collection possible. Also crucial in that endeavor was the generous support of the Duke University Center for International Studies and its executive director Robert Sikorski, and the Sidney Hellman Ehrman Chair at UC Berkeley. We are grateful as well to the staff at the Duke University Press, in particular Ken Wissoker, Jade Brooks, and our copyeditors Laura Poole and Danielle Szulczewski, for all their help over the long gestation of this project. Additional thanks to the two anonymous readers who made helpful suggestions, and to Diana Witt for preparing the index. But perhaps our deepest gratitude goes to the authors of the essays included in this volume. The opportunity to bring their remarkable work to a new and larger audience has been enormously gratifying.

Martin Jay

Sumathi Ramaswamy