Acknowledgments

The opinions in this book are mine, and I am solely responsible for them. There are those, however, whom I should like to thank for having given me the opportunity and the inspiration to write this account of a terrible period in history, even if they did not help directly with the manuscript. Kofi Annan, now Secretary-General of the United Nations, was at the time of my service in former Yugoslavia the Under-Secretary-General for Peace-Keeping Operations. He always gave me his full support and the benefit of his insights. Cedric Thornberry, the Secretary-General's first special representative in former Yugoslavia, first selected me to serve as a political officer in Eastern Slavonia in Croatia, where I was in charge until I moved to Sarajevo. He had one of the best political minds I have ever encountered, and he was very appreciative of my analyses. Yasushi Akashi, who appointed me to be the UN's chief political officer in Bosnia, had abiding confidence in me and was always eager to hear my views. His patience was inexhaustible. My deputy in Sarajevo, John Ryan, was loyal, diligent, fearless, and, unfortunately, unappreciated by many. He worked incredibly long hours, more than once risked his life, and never let career ambitions interfere with his obligations as an international peacekeeper. I shall always be grateful to Bruno Chaubert, the French warrant officer who served as my driver/bodyguard, in addition to other duties, and who had the intense courage not to be distracted when a sniper's bullet targeted him one time as we were driving over Mount Igman. Had he flinched, all four of us in the vehicle would have gone over the precipice. Dianne Fairweather, my personal assistant, both in Eastern Slavonia and in Sarajevo, was always there to provide encouragement and assistance. She had the ability to be punctual, efficient, and pleasant, even under the most difficult conditions. My thanks must also go to the support staff in New York, who gave those of us in the field hope at the very time that much of the world was cynically denouncing the United Nations. Finally, there were my editors at Duke University Press. I am indebted to Valerie Millholland, who had the fortitude to publish this book, knowing how controversial it might be. Patricia Mickelberry, my managing editor, was a delightful tyrant, always insisting on accuracy and calmly enduring my complaints.
