

Acknowledgments

This is a humble attempt to acknowledge the many humans and trees who over the years have played a role in bringing this project into the form of a book. Inspirations and insights came from many sources, and I borrowed from the work, comments, enthusiasm, and examples of many, only a fraction of whom I will be able to mention here. The cooperation, lending, and appropriation that goes into the making of a historical case study can never be given its due in laudatory footnotes or acknowledgments. But when only one author's name goes on the cover, he or she must struggle to make jalopy shibboleths appear as vibrant and new as the phrase "previously-owned cars." So be it. While I avow full title to any of this book's shortcomings, I share credit for whatever may be commendable herein with my numerous named and unnamed collaborators (why does that last word make it sound like we have committed a crime?).

This project first began to take shape during a pre-dissertation trip to Rio de Janeiro. Like many graduate students, I was unable to find substantial documentation to pursue the original project outlined in my proposal, and I began to feel like a fraud. I explained my frustration to Eliseu de Araújo Lima, the knowledgeable and implacable paladin of the Arquivo Nacional's consulting section. Eliseu graciously suggested that I might be interested in a new collection of military police inquiries that the archive staff was organizing. He introduced me to Antônio Carlos Gonçalves Valério, who headed the section organizing judicial papers. Antônio kindly allowed me to peruse the uncataloged collection, and I was instantly drawn to the rich detail and picaresque quality of these documents. I returned to the United States determined to develop a project on the social history of common Brazilian soldiers. I am deeply indebted to these dedicated archivists and many others who took the time to share documents, ideas, and coffee.

Professor Robert M. Levine of the University of Miami, Coral Gables, provided encouragement, advice, and insights that sharpened my analytical skills and guided me through bouts of vertigo during the twists and turns of the research and writing process. Dr. Eul Soo Pang first introduced me to Brazil as an undergraduate, and he changed my life in 1985 by organizing my first chance to study abroad at the Universidade Federal do Pernambuco in Recife, Brazil. Professors Mark D. Szuchman, José Carlos Sebe Bom Meihy, William C. Smith, and Steve Stein provided crucial guidance as my studies and this project gestated. Frank D. McCann, Vitor Izecksohn, Celso Castro, Jorge Luiz Prata de Souza, Gláucia Pessoa, Hendrik Kraay, and Zach Morgan always shared their expertise and provided a critical sounding board for my ideas about the military. They generously divulged their knowledge of documentation and sources. I also benefited from conversations with Brazilian colleagues who work in a variety of other areas: Ana Maria Lugão Rios, Hebe Maria Mattos de Castro, Sheila Siqueira de Castro Faria, João Luís Ribeiro Fragoso, Marta de Abreu Estevez, Marcus Joaquim Maciel de Carvalho, Fernanda Batista Bicalho, Nisia Trindade Lima, Gilberto Hochman, and Gladys Sabina Ribeiro, among many others.

I also want to thank the outside reviewers of my manuscript who identified themselves, Dain Borges and Elizabeth Ann Kuznesof for their advice and many helpful corrections that saved me from mistakes and misrepresentations. At Duke University Press, editor Valerie Millholland, editorial associate Miriam Angress, assistant managing editor Patricia Mickelberry, and copyeditor Darcy Tromanhauser have patiently and graciously guided this novice through the entire publication process.

I thank my colleagues at Michigan State University (MSU) in the Department of History and the Center for Latin American and Caribbean Studies who have helped me to develop as an instructor, a historian, and a collaborator. I extend special thanks to David Walker and prayers for his son John Henry's rapid recovery. We welcome our two new colleagues in Latin American history, Javier Pescador and Laurent Dubois, in our efforts to develop a strong undergraduate and graduate program in Latin American history at MSU. I also thank the MSU graduate students who work in Latin American history and other fields for their insightful critiques of my work over the years.

Fellow graduate students at the University of Miami provided emotional and intellectual support from the start: Maria Elisa Fernandez (who generously helped me in ways too numerous to mention here), Graham

Andrew, Carmen Alvarez, Michael LaRosa, Alan Belitsky, German Mejía, Carlos Monge, Quélia Quaresma, Anthony Johnson, Cristina Mehrrens, and others.

I also drew on the generosity and wisdom of many others on both sides of the equator, including Roger Kittleson, Sue Ann Caulfield, Mark Hoffnagel, Jeff Lesser, Joel Wolfe, Katherine Diane McCann, Flávio Gomes, Gerald Greenfield, Gayle Trainer, Steve Williams, Jean Daudelin, Kenneth Serbin, Bert Barickman, Daryl Williams, Marco Antônio Pamplona, Joan Meznar, Nancy Naro, Maria Marta Batista Bicalho, Timothy Coates, Cecília Loreto Mariz, Carlos Eugênio Líbano Soares, and Brian Owensby.

The staffs of the Arquivo Nacional (especially Sátilo Nunes), the Arquivo do Centro de Pesquisa e Documentação—Fundação Getúlio Vargas, the Arquivo Público do Estado de Pernambuco, the Arquivo Público do Estado do Rio de Janeiro, the Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística, the Biblioteca Nacional, the Arquivo da Casa de Oswaldo Cruz, the Arquivo da Casa de Rui Barbosa, and the Arquivo do Instituto Histórico e Geográfico Brasileiro all gave patient and considered assistance.

Generous research and writing support came from the James R. Scobie Memorial Prize of the American Historical Association's Conference of Latin American History, a Theodore Parker pre-dissertation grant from the University of Miami, a Fulbright IIE Fellowship, a National Endowment for the Humanities grant, and my current employer, Michigan State University.

To Erica Windler, with whom I share a passion for Brazil and its history, I hope we have many years to dividir, brincar, and amar.

I dedicate this book to three remarkable people: to my mother, Jean O'Connor Beattie, and to the memories of my father, Francis Martin Beattie, and my sister, Natalie Childress Beattie. My parents encouraged me to pursue my interests, and gave me enough room to make my own mistakes and learn from them. I thank them for their enduring love, support, and patience (I know I sometimes tried it). My mom taught me to love reading by example and by taking me to the public library each week as a boy. I learned about communicating from my father's mischievous sociability. I miss his playful banter and caring jeers. My sister Natalie taught me how to swim before I have any memories of life. I still find it hard that I cannot speak to her and float in her well of good cheer and humor.
