

Acknowledgments

This book would not have been possible without the support and guidance that I received from a number of faculty members at the University of California at Berkeley. During the past three decades, Troy Duster, my dissertation chair, almost single-handedly kept antiracist scholarship alive in the sociology department and thus created the institutional space for me to pursue this project. I am also thankful to Troy for both his insightful feedback on earlier drafts of this manuscript and the letters of reference he wrote that enabled me to secure a Fulbright Student Program award to finance the bulk of the research.

I am especially indebted to Russell Thornton for having been one of a handful of sociologists in the United States who made Indians a valid topic of study within the discipline. Moreover, Russell reviewed versions of Racial Revolutions, never wavered in his enthusiasm for this project, and generously allowed me to use his office at a time when I had neither computer nor work space. His letter of support was also key to my reception of a Social Science Research Council Predissertation Fellowship, which allowed me to conduct preliminary research for this manuscript in 1992.

Despite his numerous obligations, Pedro Antonio Noguera always made time to meet with me, write letters of recommendation, offer suggestions on various drafts of this manuscript, or have me over to his home for dinner and family celebrations. His commitment to bridging the academic and nonacademic worlds inspired me to attempt the same in this book. Gerald Vizenor, a professor in Native American studies, gave me a healthy irreverence for the social sciences as well as a deeper appreciation for the significance of irony, humor, and a good story. I think anyone familiar with his scholarship will quickly notice the important influence he has had on Racial Revolutions.

In 1989, I had the good fortune to meet Brackette Williams when she was a visiting scholar at Berkeley. Besides her extraordinary generosity—both pedagogically and materially—I am most grateful to Brackette for introducing me to the logic of symbols, demonstrating through example the significance of language play, and offering an invaluable critical overview of the social scientific study of race, nation, and class. She was also kind enough to review several chapters of this manuscript in their later versions. Then, too, there were a few other faculty at Berkeley whose scholarship, teaching, and support helped make this project possible and so deserve some mention: Gerald Berreman, Margaret Conkey, Peter Evans, Jerome Karabel, Linda Lewin, Kristin Luker, and Jack Potter.

Especially in the early phases of this book, many friends and colleagues were just as vital to my survival and success as were the faculty who mentored me. Many thanks to the following individuals for their affection, intellectual stimulation, material assistance, and appreciation of a good time: Eric Avila, Ricky Bluthenthal, Chris Dunn, Frieda Ekotto, Gilbert Ekotto, Stephen Epstein, Anthony de Falco, Brian Folk, Maria Franklin, Derrick Gilbert, Phil Gorsky, Nathaniel Hill, Arnell Hinkel, Dan Hoffman, Yumi Iwai, Donna Jones, Vandana Kohli, Natasha Kirsten Kraus, Paul Lopes, Jelani Mahiri, Imar Moreira, Sherrie Morford, Kenny Mostern, Ruth Mostern, Sarah Murray, Trisha Newland, Lowell Noble, Jodi O'Brien, Selma Oliveira, Jennifer Pierce, Phara Pietre, Tim Riera, Marlon Riggs, Darrell Robinson, Glen Switzke, Amber Tally, Guy Tally, Patricia Vattuone, Ara Wilson, John Wolfe, and Abdul-Aleem Zaid.

I would like to give special thanks to Dr. Larry Casalino, who at a time when I was desperately broke provided me with the physical examination required by the Fulbright Student Program free of charge; the late Tom McGlenn, who rescued me from disaster and gave me shelter on numerous occasions; Luis Absuaid Garcia, whose charm, intellect, and brotherhood kept me going; and Naheed Islam and Raihan Zamil, who offered me wonderful meals and company, allowed me to use their home as a refuge and their car for transportation, and commented on drafts of the manuscript.

In Brazil, I would first like to extend my deepest gratitude to everyone who agreed to be interviewed, many of whom will remain nameless to protect their privacy. The willingness of these individuals to share their stories with a stranger represented a tremendous act of faith and trust.

I worked hard not to betray this confidence by attempting to present their remarks, ideas, experiences, histories, and sentiments in a manner that was respectful and faithful to their responses. I believe that I have succeeded in this regard and hope that they agree.

A number of Brazilians taught me the meaning of hospitality. Time after time, I would arrive in a city or small town, virtually penniless and with only the name of a contact, and on every occasion I would be taken into people's homes and treated as if I were kin. Such acts of generosity can never be adequately thanked; nonetheless, I would like to extend my deepest appreciation and gratitude to these individuals for their warmth, friendship, faith, humor, and kindness: Antônia de Lourdes Alves, Garanga Barreto, Carla Simone Barbosa de Brito, Maria Lira Marques Borges, Maria and Domingos das Braes, Antônia Rita da Conceição, Eva Maria de Cruz, Eliane Rodrigues da Graça and her daughter Helena, Tomoya Inyaku, Ana Lidia Ivo, Jerry Adriane de Jesus and his mother and grandmother, Geralda and Claudia Santana Leão, Maria Ferreira Lopes, Terezinha de Oliveira Moreira and her family, Nando Neves and his parents, Benvinda and Eugenio Pankararu and their family, Cleonice Wakire Pankararu, Bekoy Pataxó, Karakana Pataxó, Puhú Pataxó, Bruna Santos, Maria Santos, Selma Santos, Wilson Dias Santos, Maria das Dores Barbosa dos Santos, Patricia and Roberto dos Santos, Valdi Ferreira da Silva, Sonia Maria Vieira da Silva, Dale Robertson Fernandes Soares, Geralda Chaves Soares, Regina Helena Vianna and her parents, Claudio Cesar Vianna, Isabella Vianna, Daniella Vianna, and Lilian Nunes Vieira.

Two scholars were pivotal to my success in Brazil. Antônio Carlos de Souza Lima was supportive of my research from its earliest stages. Ever encouraging and enthusiastic, he went out of his way to thoroughly and patiently note the scholars, activists, and scholarship that he thought might be helpful. Thanks to Antônio Carlos, I felt at home at the Museu Nacional in Rio de Janeiro. The other key scholar was Geralda Chaves Soares. If there is anyone who deserves an honorary Ph.D., it is Geralda. A tireless researcher and activist, she has conducted almost two decades of fieldwork and published a number of groundbreaking books on Indians in Minas Gerais. This project would not have been realized without her insights, references, and general support.

The transcribers were Martha Marques Alves, Carla Simone Barbosa de Brito, Claudia Santana Leão, Nivea Mendes Ribeiro, and Wilson Dias Santos. They did an outstanding job, oftentimes simply on the promise of one day receiving payment—a promise that was eventually fulfilled.

Brazilian institutions that were extremely helpful to me were the Museu Nacional (special thanks to Luis Fernando Dias Duarte for establishing this affiliation), Estudos Afro-Asiáticos (thanks here to Beluce Belucci, Carlos A. Hasenbalg, Ana Senna, and Sonia Maria Vieira da Silva), Instituto Brasileiro de Análises Sociais e Econômicas (my gratitude to Carla Simone Barbosa de Brito, Tomoya Inyaku, Atila Roque, and Cleide Quiteria dos Santos), Centro de Documentação Ely Ferreira da Silva, Conselho Indigenista Missionario Leste (special thanks to Luís Lobo), the federal universities of Brasília, Minas Gerais, Pernambuco (special thanks to Silvia Martins and Ivson Ferreira), and Rio de Janeiro (my appreciation to João Pacheco de Oliveira), the “Indian Tent” at the Environmental Summit 1992 (my thanks to Ed Burnstick), the Ford Foundation in Rio de Janeiro (thanks to Eddie Telles), and the Comissão Fulbright in Rio de Janeiro and Brasília (my gratitude to Marco Antônio da Rocha and Terry V. McIntyre).

The research for this project would not have been possible without the financial support of the Fulbright Student Program award, and an International Predissertation Fellowship from the Social Science Research Council and American Council of Learned Societies, with funds provided by the Ford Foundation. I want to also express my appreciation to the restaurants (Broadmoor and New South Wales in Colorado Springs, La Fleur and Simpatico in Seattle) that provided employment on my returns from Brazil. The camaraderie that I had with my colleagues in those restaurants was a welcome and needed complement to the solace of the time I spent writing.

Besides UC Berkeley, three other U.S. institutions of higher education greatly facilitated this project. The Colorado College—and in particular, the Department of Sociology—took me under its wing, providing an affiliation and, most important, an office. My special appreciation goes out to Margie Duncombe, Norma Flemming, Jeff Livesay, and Michael Siddoway. The Department of Sociology at the University of California at Santa Barbara also supported me for one quarter as a visiting professor. Thanks to Rich Appelbaum, Chris Allen, Kum-Kum Bhavnani, Bill Bielby, Denise Bielby, Susan Dalton, Mitch Duneier, Dick Flacks, John Foran, Avery Gordon, Harvey Molotch, Chris Newfield, Constance Penley, Cedric Robinson, Beth Schneider, Jane Ward, and Nancy Willstater.

The Henry M. Jackson School of International Studies at the University of Washington was my institutional and intellectual base during most of the writing of this book, and thus deserves much of the credit for its realization. My gratitude to those colleagues who were especially supportive: Jennifer Aradanas, Jere Bacharach, Tani Barlow, Chuck Berquist, Johnella Butler, Mary Callahan, Aaron Fox, Christoph Giebel, Lauren Goodlad, Marilyn Ivy, Lucy Jarosz, Susan Jeffords, Gene Hunn, Resat Kesaba, Charles Keyes, Victoria Lawson, Joel Migdal, Alicia Palacio, John Pemberton, Camillo Penna, Gigi Petterson, Denise Pruitt, Sabrina Ramet, Matt Sparke, Cynthia Steele, and Madeleine Yue Dong. I also had the pleasure of working with a number of outstanding students at the University of Washington who were kind enough to offer feedback on various drafts or help with translations: Becky Anerued, Emily Arfin, David Carlson, Sandra Hernandez, Dawn Hewett, Leila Lehnen, Molly Robertson, Heidi Shultheis and her partner Francisco C. Amaral dos Santos, Christi Sue, and Mark Vasquez.

A few individuals need to be singled out for their emotional support at crucial moments and, in most cases, invaluable editorial advice: Jere Bacharach, Ingrid Banks, Howie Becker, Elizabeth Cook-Lynn, William Darity, John Foran, Maria Franklin and her parents, Jan French, Avery Gordon, Ruth Simms Hamilton, Gail Hanlon, Martha Heller, Patricia Mickelberry, Valerie Millholland, Sabrina Ramet, José Augusto Laranjeiras Sampaio, Ana Flavia Santos, Pauline Escudero Shafer, Audra Simpson, Nikhil Pal Singh, Paulette Thompson, Stefano Varese, Howard Winant, the late Joe Wood, and Leon Zamosc. My appreciation as well to the two anonymous reviewers of Racial Revolutions for their excellent suggestions.

With regard to my family, let me begin by thanking my mother, Janice Roberts Wilbur, and stepfather, Michael Wilbur. If it had not been for their passion for learning, faith in my abilities, commitment to social justice, and insistence on pursuing one's vision, then I would never have entered graduate school, let alone completed this book. My other mother, Mamie Lois Twine, was invariably reliable in providing useful words of wisdom. I could always count on her keen wit and charm to bring a smile to my face. In addition to this, she came through with an emergency loan from time to time despite having little herself. My father, Win Warren, has been consistently behind me through some difficult times. His love, willingness to accept collect calls and make emergency loans, and respect for my decisions even when he did not agree made the difference between utter ruin and my ability to continue on. For this I am of course extremely thankful. My grandparents—Wava Roberts, Melvin Warren, and Pauline Warren—have been supportive of my endeavors since I was born, and this project proved no exception. To them, all of my love and respect. Let me also mention the names of my other family members, who I am sure had no idea what I have been doing for the past several years, but nonetheless have continued to love and support me: Britney Abbott, Marsha Berry, Catherine Brownley, Dave Brownley, D. J. Brownley, Aerian Saxon, Stacy Saxon, Paul Christopher Twine, Joe Twine, Christine Warren, Jessica Warren, Mitchell Warren, and Terry Warren. Finally, a special thanks to my uncle Richard Warren, who gave me a one thousand dollar gift that helped me survive one summer during the writing of this book.

The person most responsible for the fruition of this book is my partner, France Winddance Twine. Winddance and I began and endured graduate school together. We have worked in tandem on several projects, and this one proved no exception. She was key in the conceptualization and development of this book. Her belief in the worthiness of this project sustained me through a number of difficult times. Winddance was the one person I could depend on for affection and humor. Moreover, Winddance kept all in order while I was in Brazil conducting research. Remarkably, she did this while completing her first book and launching her professional career as an assistant professor, enabling us to eat, keep a roof over our heads, and pay the bills. For this, somehow my deepest gratitude and love seem pathetically inadequate.
