My first contact with Colombia came in 1963-1965 when I served as a Peace Corps volunteer in western Cundinamarca. In July, 1970, I returned to Colombia to begin fifteen months of research made possible through a grant from the Foreign Area Fellowship Program. Funding for a year of dissertation write-up time was provided by the same program, a Wetter Fellowship from the Department of History at Stanford University, and the Committee on International Studies at Stanford. Since completion of the dissertation I have returned twice to Colombia for additional research thanks to grants from the National Endowment for the Humanities, the American Philosophical Society, and the Duke University Research Council.

Many Colombians aided me in my research. I wish to thank especially Fray Alberto Lee López, archivist at the Colombian Academy of History, who helped orient and enrich my search for primary documents. At the National Library and Archive the entire staff proved friendly and helpful, but Sra. Blanca de Armenta's charm made my early work in the Sala de Investigadores especially enjoyable. Special thanks go also to Dr. Jaime Duarte French, who, as Director of the Biblioteca Luis Angel Arango, extended me every aid to research in that modern, pleasant library rich in materials on twentieth-century Colombia; to the officials at the Archive of the Ministry of Defense who assisted me in the use of the 170 volumes of telegrams relating to the war housed in that repository; and to the congenial and efficient staff of the notary public at Fusagasugá, Cundinamarca, who made work in that warm coffee-country town a pleasure.

The example of a new and dynamic generation of Colombian historians has greatly influenced this work. In their quest for solutions to the problems of the present, these young historians are overcoming the formidable material obstacles to serious historical research in an underdeveloped country and transforming the quality of Colombian historiography. I have benefited particularly from discussions with Hector Melo, Marco Palacios, and Hermes Tovar.

In the United States, I would like to thank John Johnson, whose great humanity, dedication to scholarship, and support over the years created the environment which made this study possible. David Bushnell provided encouragement and many constructive suggestions at a critical stage in the work, as did John TePaske, my colleague at Duke. Frank Safford, a friendly but severe and demanding critic, gave generously of his time and understanding of nineteenth-century Colombian history and helped me to clarify many points in my argument. William McGreevey also read the manuscript and offered helpful suggestions. Dot Sapp, whose efficiency and graciousness are legendary at Duke, typed the final draft of the manuscript.

To all these institutions, committees, functionaries, and scholars I wish to express my appreciation for their interest and support. Naturally, all statements and conclusions presented are my own and do not necessarily reflect the views of any of the sponsors or critics of the study.

Finally, thanks go to my wife, Magola, who has taught me much about Colombia that is difficult to glean from books and old papers, and who contributed to the completion of this study in many indirect but profound ways.

The book is dedicated to the memory of my wife's father, Julio Bohórquez, and to our children, Joel and Andrea. Their grandfather was three years old when the War of the Thousand Days began, and throughout his life, as a small coffee grower in Cundinamarca, he grappled individually and creatively, if ultimately unsuccessfully, with many of the same historical forces I have attempted to analyze in this history. As our understanding of these historical forces increases, so also will the ability of my own generation to work collectively to build a freer, more egalitarian social order in the world for our children.
