

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

No work in anthropology is ever an individual undertaking, in spite of the sometimes solitary life experienced in the field or at the writing table. Many people have generously contributed their time and support to make this study a reality; it is thus, in a very real sense, the result of the efforts of all those whose goodwill made it possible to bring the project to fruition.

This study might never have been written without the help, encouragement, intellectual stimulation, and scholarly example of Professor John V. Murra. For fifteen years John Murra has been a good critic and a good friend, and in the course of that time he has taught me many things. First and foremost, he introduced me to a new view of Andean society which is positive and exciting. He argued that we can look underneath the poverty and oppression of present-day rural peoples in the Andes to find the sociocultural continuities which still serve as a source of meaning and purpose for them. He also taught me a great deal about the concept "commitment." His dedication to anthropology as a profession and his demand that we consider the implication of research for the people studied and for the host country are models that we should all follow.

I also would like to thank the other members of my doctoral committee at Cornell, Professors Donald Solá and Thomas Kirsch.

x Acknowledgments

Both were gracious and generous with their time and guidance. Jeff Cole, Marilyn Cole, and Thomas Abercrombie all provided inestimable help in obtaining documents from the Archivo General de la Nación in Buenos Aires and in our discussions about Yura and the study. Other friends and colleagues in the northern hemisphere provided moral support, good ideas and suggestions, and hours of challenging conversation. I cannot refer to all of them here, but I would like to mention Martha Anders, Deborah Caro, Valerie Estes, Olivia Harris, Kevin Healy, Jim Jones, Brook Larson, Mary Ann Medlin, Tristan Platt, and Frank Salomon. Many students in my classes at Goucher College also stimulated me to rethink certain aspects of the study. I especially thank Lisa deLeonardis for her work on the maps and diagrams. Madeline Kotowski patiently retyped much of the manuscript.

In Bolivia, Dr. Gunnar Mendoza, director of the National Archive of Bolivia in Sucre, greatly facilitated my access to litigation and census records from the Yura area. The padrecitos Jesús Bello, Luis Alfredo Díaz, Paco Dubert, and especially my good friend Ricardo Senande were always ready to assist in any way they could. Daniel Acebey generously loaned us living quarters when we were in the town of Yura. Luis Morató and Haydée Lara de Morató deserve a special thanks for all their years of friendship.

In Yura there are so many people to whom I should express gratitude that I hardly know where to begin. The Yuras were kind and generous hosts; I still marvel at the warmth with which they received us. Let me at least mention Alejandra Herrera and Justo Quiroga; Julia Puma and Francisco Quiroga; and the Chiquichi alcalde troupe of 1979. Many others, who will go unnamed, were of great assistance during the stay in Yura.

The original research was carried out under the auspices of a Fellowship on Social Change from the Inter-American Foundation. A return trip in 1984 was partially financed by a grant from Goucher College and the stay in 1987 by a Fulbright fellowship.

Above all, I owe the deepest gratitude to Inge Maria Harman, my wife, fellow anthropologist, and companion in the field. As we carried out our two fieldwork projects together, Inge was a constant adviser, colleague, and supporter. Her sensitivity to others is unparalleled. Her editorial hand has been a great help in preparing the present study. Words cannot begin to express my thanks. It is to Inge that this work is dedicated.