

Acknowledgments

As I reach the end of a road long-traveled but full of rewarding and interesting side-trips, I have many individuals and institutions to thank. My husband, Greg, insisted upon being named first and last in this list of acknowledgments, so here is the initial installment. He has been my number one fan for finishing this book, cheering and prodding me on so that someday we could spend more time together.

On the financial front, several institutions provided the funding that is so vital to the research and writing efforts of scholars. They make public dissemination of our ideas possible. Among those whose generous grants helped support this study are the Program for Cultural Cooperation between Spain's Ministry of Culture and U.S. Universities, the Spain-Florida Alliance, the University of Florida Department of History, the American Historical Association, the American Philosophical Society, the Oklahoma Foundation for the Humanities, the University of Tulsa Faculty Development Summer Fellowship Program, and the University of Tulsa Faculty Research Grant Program.

Research is also made possible and enjoyable through the efforts of archives, libraries, and collections whose staffs locate, preserve, and organize the documents, maps, books, and artifacts that contribute to our interpretations of the past. Those institutions that provided materials for my interpretation of colonial New Orleans include the Archivo General de Indias in Seville, the Archivo General de Simancas, the Louisiana and Lower Mississippi Valley Collections of Hill Memorial Library (Louisiana State University), the Center for Louisiana Studies (University of Southwestern Louisiana), the Louisiana Historical Center of the Louisiana State Museum, the Archives of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, The Historic New Orleans Collection, Orleans Parish Notarial Archives, the New Orleans Public Library, Howard-Tilton Memorial Library (Tulane University), the Loyola University (New Orleans) Archives, and the Family History Library in Salt Lake City, Utah. I especially appreciate the services of James F. Sefcik,

Charles E. Nolan, Kathryn Page, Alfred Lemmon, John Barbry, Sally K. Reeves, Wilbur E. Meneray, Carl A. Brasseaux, and Glenn R. Conrad.

Numerous people helped guide and shape my work, first as a thesis, then a dissertation, and finally this book, which is by no means perfect (with the usual caveat that I am entirely to blame) but is much improved as a result of their assistance. I owe a particular debt of gratitude to the late Roger M. Haigh and to Ronald G. Coleman for introducing me to my eighteenth-century friends in New Orleans when this project began as a master's thesis at the University of Utah. Larry R. Gerlach acquainted me with the enticements of historical detection. Several mentors at the University of Florida further sharpened my scholarly skills and guided me through a maze of theoretical constructs, demographic analysis, and the use and evaluation of primary and secondary source materials: Cheryll Ann Cody, Lyle N. McAlister, David Bushnell, Kermit L. Hall, David P. Geggus, Jeffrey D. Needell, Gláucio Ary Dillon Soares, Patrick J. Geary, and James Amelang. Murdo J. MacLeod, chair of my dissertation committee, has provided advice, criticism, and encouragement; his thoughtful insights and continuing friendship are greatly appreciated. Fellow scholars of Louisiana and the greater Caribbean also served to inspire and challenge me with their own excellent research. Among them are Jane G. Landers, Gwendolyn Midlo Hall, Daniel H. Usner Jr., David J. Weber, Paul F. Lachance, L. Virginia Gould, Stephen Webre, Paul E. Hoffman, Light Townsend Cummins, Patricia Brady, Judith K. Schafer, and James H. Dormon. To my dear friend and colleague at the University of Tulsa, James P. Ronda, go special thanks for reading an early version of this manuscript and concocting a title for it. Thanks also to Jeanne Ronda for preparing the index and sharing her friendship as well. Another colleague at the University of Tulsa, Thomas M. Buoye, read and commented on the manuscript, proffered his friendship, and with volleyball games and bicycling trips relieved my mind of mundane academic matters.

Credit for the nuts and bolts of putting this book together and producing it in its final form goes to the able staff of Duke University Press. It has been a pleasure to work with two fine editors, first Rachel Toor and then Valerie Millholland. Managing editor Jean Brady and copyeditor Joan E. Howard helped improve the text immensely. The manuscript especially benefited from the insightful criticism of two reviewers, one anonymous and the other self-identified. You know who you are; thank you. Additional accolades go to Patty Eischen at the Louisiana State Museum and John Magill and Sally Stassi at The Historic New Orleans Collection for helping to obtain illustrations.

Finally, and most important, I would like to acknowledge the material and mental support of friends and family too numerous to list here. My father, mother, sister, brother, and in-laws gave me much love, encouragement, and assistance which I can never hope to repay. Heartfelt thanks go to my parents for instilling in me the belief that I could do and be whatever I wanted. And now for his second and final billing: words cannot convey the gratitude I feel for my husband Greg—or his delight that I finished this book. With much devotion, personal sacrifice, and understanding he endured months of separation while I visited archives in Spain and the United States, entered data into the computer, and pounded away at the keyboard.
