

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Visual Pedagogy would not have been possible without feedback and input from so many people—more than I can mention. I am grateful to Warren Crichlow, Douglas Crimp, David Rodowick, Sharon Willis and Janet Wolff at the University of Rochester for supporting the research that formed the basis for this book. Their guidance was essential to this project’s development. Friends and colleagues in the Visual and Cultural Studies Program at the University of Rochester—especially Karen Kosasa, Walid Ra’ad, Phil Gentile, and Allen Topolski—provided a wonderful environment to study and work in. I thank Susan Cahan, Jerry Philogene, Claudia Hernandez, Rayna Lampkins Fielder, Dan Cameron, Marcia Tucker, and others at the New Museum of Contemporary Art in New York. Their faith in my ideas allowed me to incorporate my research into my curatorial and programming work at the New Museum in the mid-1990s. Numerous artists and media producers, including Almir Almas, Julia Meltzer, Greg Bordowitz, Steve Schiff, Mona Jimenez, Rebeca Odes and Ester Drill, provided me with important feedback and insights and gave me access to the material and interviews that form the basis of this book. Equally important to this project’s development was ongoing dialog with media educators and collaborative groups including Steven Goodman and the staff of the Educational Video Center, Laura Vural and the staff at Rise and Shine, Chris Bratton and the members of Video Machete, Jubilee Arts, ARTEC, the Hetrick Martin Institute, and the Bay Area Video Collective. I thank Chon Noriega for editorial feedback for the chapter on local television in Brazil and N. Frank Ukadike for the insightful comments he offered during the editing of the chapter on African cinema, and to Amy Herzog for help researching illustrations. Thanks, also, to Aubrey Anable for her careful indexing of this book. I am grateful to have had the opportunity to work with editor Ken Wisoker. He and his expert staff at Duke provided thoughtful and clear direction throughout the revision process.

Finally and most significantly, I cannot thank Lisa Cartwright enough for her inspiration, feedback, editorial suggestions, and unfailing support throughout this project. More than anything, our close working relationship made this book possible.
