The debts I have incurred in writing this book are enormous, and will never be paid. They go back to kitchen talk with Florian Bail, and to my time at Reed College and Queen's University, where teachers and fellow students pushed me to keep learning. I was first given the freedom to explore many of the book's themes at Johns Hopkins University under the supervision of Richard Flathman, the very best advisor and interlocutor one could hope to have. Kirstie McClure prodded me to improve my historical and theoretical skills—as well as my writing—while William Connolly, J.G.A. Pocock, and Ali Khan provided additional guidance. Other early helpers included Lanfranco Blanchetti, James Crimmins, Kaveh Ehsani, Charles Euchner, John Maltese, Rina Palumbo, and Meg Russett, as well as John Guillory, David Harvey, and the late Sharon Stephens. Arguments were later tested at conferences in the United States and Canada, and in seminars and workshops at the University of Illinois at Chicago and the University of Chicago. Chapter 4 appeared in Utilitas 13:4 (November 2001). I am grateful to Yoshio Nagai and his colleagues from the Japanese Society for Utilitarian Studies for their invitation to present a draft of chapter 5; ideas for chapter 7 were developed at the invitation of the International Society for Utilitarian Studies Bentham Seminar at University College London. Philip Schofield and the staff of the Bentham Project at UCL are wonderful hosts. I am indebted to conversations with them, and to responses from numerous discussants and audiences. The book itself could not have been written without the support of my colleagues and students in the Department of Political Science at UIC, and without the time provided by the Department, by grants from the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Research, and by a sabbatical leave from the University. Valerie Johnson, Marla Lane, Amalia Pallares, and Daniel Thomas were especially important sources of tips, aid, and comfort. I thank the University College London library for permission to quote from the Bentham Collection, the University of Michigan's Early English Books Online service for its rich store of seventeenth-century writings, and the UIC library and its staff for access to a wealth of their own and others' materials. Jeffrey Johnson's loyal and ultra-competent assistance at a late stage was invaluable. I thank Raphael Allen for his early and steady faith in the project. He and Fred Kameny and their colleagues at Duke University Press have consistently provided the intelligent and patient guidance I needed to produce a relatively brief and, I hope, readable text.

Several individuals read and commented on specific chapters, including Isaac Balbus, Mark Canuel, Doris Graber, David Hasen, Don Herzog, Meredith McGill, Sophia Mihic, Norma Moruzzi, Andrew Parker, Gordon Schochet, Mildred Schwartz, and Elizabeth Wingrove. I have never even met David Burchell, but he graciously gave helpful comments on chapter 5 upon request. My friend Stephen Schwartz always responded quickly and generously when asked to check and correct French translations. I am grateful to Balbus and Canuel for their careful readings of the entire manuscript, as I am to two anonymous readers for Duke University Press. At different times three wonderfully talented thinkers and writers—McGill, Mihic, and Wingrove—worked around the clock on parts of the manuscript, and tried to make some of their talent rub off on me. Any moments of excellence in what follows should be credited to their insistent criticism.

Conversations with several old and new friends in different walks of life have aided my efforts, as has the indulgent support of a close extended family—parents Fred and Mary, brothers John and Peter, in-laws, cousins, aunts and uncles, “family friends,” the Reed gang, and more—and above all Sophia, and our new companion Mia. I hope that this study, despite all of its omissions and remaining obscurities, reflects in some way the compassionate collective intelligence of the plural circles in which I have been privileged to travel. This book investigates the emergence of modern utility and the political use to which use has been put; in other words, it engages underexplored features of the commodity form. My own fortunate experience at the hands of others, and the existence of this text itself, speak to the power of a different relation—the continuing circulation of the gift.
