

Acknowledgments

The writing of this book has had a long generation, and each stage has been a process that has benefited and been enabled by many thoughtful intercessors. I owe many thanks to my faculty and staff colleagues at Duke University in the African and African-American Studies Program and in the English Department. I also want to thank a very, very special group of graduate students, colleagues, and friends who listened throughout and who cared about this project and about me: Houston A. Baker Jr., William Darity Jr., Cathy Davidson, Paula Giddings, Kevin Haynes, Candice Jenkins, Wahneema Lubiano, Erik Ludwig, Debbie McDowell, Leslie Mitchner, Ifeoma Nwankwo, Jill Petty, Charlotte Pierce-Baker, Reynolds Price, Nicole Waligora, Ken Wissoker, Wilford Samuels, and Evie Shockley. Colleagues and auditors from the United States, Paris, Germany, and England have been audiences at various points in this process, giving wonderful feedback and encouragement as this writing went on and on, and invariably sharing their own stories and memories with me, a gift that never failed to energize.

I owe thanks to Riche Richardson who assisted at the earliest stages of the book. As I finally moved toward completing this work, I could not have brought it to conclusion without the incredibly fine and persistent research skills and critical insights of my research assistant Stephane Robolin, and the organizational magic effected by Allison Puckett. I am especially appreciative of the skilled insights of Lauren Osborne, who helped enormously in making this a better book. The thoughtful and meticulous work of my readers and editors at Duke University Press significantly strengthened the manuscript. My colleagues and friends in the Dean's office have made this new dimension of my life satisfying, and I thank them for their making room for me at the table. I am deeply appreciative of the example of Bill Chafe's scholarship, and the friendship and support that he has extended to me, and I will be forever in the debt of Maurice Wallace, whose generosity and constancy have been both necessary and kind. I continue to benefit from the warm embrace and love of the Friday Night Women, the sisterhood that masks as a book club.

I am deeply grateful to have a family whose loving support is constant and sure: my father, Claude D. Clapp, and my sister, Leslie Ellen Clapp Ezie. The spirits of my mother, Ouida Eleanor, who died just as this book neared publication, and my sister, Karen Andrea, constantly and lovingly hover. As with my precious son Bem K., I feel their spirits ever and always with me. Finally, the counsel, faith, and love that my husband, Russell, and my wise and wonderful daughter, Ayana Tamu, share with me every day sustains, heals, and allows me to persevere.

I am fortunate to be within such communities.
