This book is the material result of years of research and writing, a process that began on March 5, 1995, with the discovery of an article in the Honolulu Advertiser about the efforts being made by the United States to account for soldiers still missing in Southeast Asia. Along the way, I have had the exceedingly good (and, I gather, somewhat rare) fortune of greatly enjoying the research, the writing, and the editorial process that necessarily accompanies such a project. Apart from personal deficiencies that lend themselves to taking satisfaction in this sort of work, the rewarding aspects of this enterprise have resulted in substantial degree from the assistance I've received from many people, most of whom were too generous to know better and each of whom will not here receive the full measure of the gratitude they are truly due from me. Nonetheless, I hope the following individuals will take my word for it when I say that the positive elements of this book are a result of their contributions, and will understand my desire for an equally generous group of people onto whom I might slough off the numerous shortcomings that are ultimately my own.

The staff at the Joint Task Force-Full Accounting (JTF-FA) at Camp H. M. Smith in Honolulu, Hawai'i, was gracious with both their time and their insights during my research visits there in the spring of 2000. My thanks in particular to Raymond Spock, then-Director of Intelligence and to Lt. Col. Franklin Childress, the always-accommodating Public Affairs Officer at that time. I am also indebted to Paul Mather, Senior Analyst at the Department of Defense Prisoner of War/Missing Personnel Office (DPMO), who agreed to be interviewed in Honolulu on very short notice. My thanks as well to Jefferson Willard, former Linguist/Analyst with Detachment Two of the JTF-FA in Hanoi for his time and conversation during an impromptu meeting there in December 1997. I regard it as one of the more pleasurable ironies of this project that Jeff turned up four years later as a student in two of my political science classes at the University of Hawai'i at Manoa in Honolulu.

The staff at the Central Identification Laboratory, Hawai'i (CILHI) was very helpful as well. I am particularly indebted to Staff Sergeant Earl Bushong, Jr., External Liaison, U.S. Army CILHI, for facilitating my visit there, also made in spring 2000. Others gave generously of their time during the visit, including Major Andrew Irwin, Executive Officer, U.S. Army CILHI, Dr. John E. Byrd, Physical Anthropologist, and Bradley J. Adams, Forensic Anthropologist.

Many thanks are also due to Dee Spock and Sara Collins, whose assistance contributed greatly to my understanding of the effort to account for American soldiers missing in Southeast Asia. Katherine Maria Schlatter also generously shared her primary materials with me.

I have benefited greatly from strong personal and intellectual support throughout the duration of this project. I am particularly indebted to Sanford Schram, now at Bryn Mawr College Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research, for unfailing support during his stay in Honolulu and subsequently. Geoffrey White was generous with his time and thoughtful commentary, while Craig Howes provided both indefatigable enthusiasm and a breadth of knowledge without which this project would never have advanced beyond the planning stages. Kathie Kane and Carolyn di Palma gave the sort of encouragement that comes from people gifted enough to see diamonds in the analytical rough that accompanies any research project. The Department of Political Science at the University of Hawai'i at Manoa provided a warm and thoroughly supportive environment for this project, through both financial support and an intellectual setting whose equal I have yet to encounter. My thanks in particular to Kathy Ferguson, Michael Shapiro, Jon Goldberg-Hiller, Sankaran Krishna, and Phyllis Turnbull, each of whom guided this project through its many phases with a combination of moral, intellectual, and personal support. Every researcher should be so lucky to benefit from such support. My thanks as well to Nevzat Soguk, Neal Milner, Manfred Henningsen, Noenoe Silva, John Wilson, and Deane Neubauer. Other friends and colleagues have sustained me in ways they likely never fully realized, including Marie Thorsten, Allison Yap, Brian Richardson, Eric Ishiwata, Fred Klemmer, Gina Pusateri, Kamuela Young, Kennan Ferguson, Kerry Burch, Jill Keesbury, Spike Bradford, John Pincince, Debbie Halbert, Jorge Fernandes, Karen Sprague, Christopher Bondy, Lisa Pasko, and Alison Zecha. Dr. Laura Heffernan (née Boesch) provided invaluable assistance in my effort to understand the readjustment experiences of Vietnam veterans. Vicky Lebbin of Hamilton Library at the University of Hawai'i at Manoa was a constant source of research assistance.

The editors of the Politics, History, and Culture series provided provocative commentary and enthusiastic support throughout this project, particularly during a visit to Ann Arbor, Michigan, in December 2001. My thanks in particular to the series coeditors, Julia Adams and George Steinmetz, for their amiable and exceptionally intelligent critique of this work at the manuscript stage as well as support along the way. My thanks as well to the other members of the editorial board, including Fernando Coronil, Mamadou Diouf, Geoff Eley, Müge Göcek, Nancy Hunt, Webb Keane, David Laitin, Julie Skurski, Margaret Somers, Katherine Verdery, and Elizabeth Wingrove. It has also been a great pleasure working with Duke University Press, in particular with my editor, Raphael Allen, who has been unfailing in his assistance to me. My thanks also to Imani Owens, Courtney Berger, Mark Mastromarino, and Cherie Westmoreland, as well as to three anonymous reviewers whose insightful commentary contributed greatly to this project.

An earlier version of chapter 6 appeared as "The Ethics of Accounting: The Search for American Soldiers Missing in Vietnam" in Millennium: Journal of International Studies 31, no. 2. The revised version is reprinted with permission.

To my family, Malvern, Nancy, and Charlie Hawley, goes an expression of appreciation that simply defies adequate articulation. In particular, I want it known that each of them voluntarily read this book in manuscript form and offered editorial suggestions throughout. We all should be so lucky to enjoy such support. To my parents, an extra thanks for providing the space for three months of uninterrupted writing in the summer of 2003, and for the presence of mind to wait a full three weeks before asking what I was doing all those hours in the basement. To the gang in Twickenham, my thanks for helping stave off the lunacy that would surely have been my lot without you.

Finally, a word of immeasurable gratitude to Tim Kaufman-Osborn, to whom this book is dedicated. I know I speak for many when I say that life itself would be substantially more solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short were it not for the innumerable ways in which he supports the efforts of his students at Whitman College and beyond. If “throw-away comments too oblique to be intelligible” have here been kept to a minimum, it is because of Tim’s long-standing and selfless attention to my personal, intellectual, and professional endeavors over the course of many years.
