

Acknowledgments

A great many people contributed to the completion of this book. First and foremost, we would like to thank the contributors, who worked with us as we tried to put together a book calling attention to the pivotal role that Congress plays in the shaping of constitutional values. We would also like to thank Valerie Millholland of Duke University Press. Based on a prospectus calling attention to the need for an interdisciplinary collection on this topic, Valerie signed onto this project. At approximately the same time, the editors of the Duke Law Journal agreed to publish a symposium held in 2001 on Congress and the Constitution. That symposium helped shape this project. Not only did some of the contributors to this book test their ideas in that symposium, but its success proved instrumental in propelling this project. Another symposium was equally instrumental. In 2002 the Institute of Bill of Rights Law at William & Mary hosted a conference at which the contributors to this book presented preliminary versions of their chapters. This conference both facilitated completion of the chapters and sharpened them. Thanks are owed to Dave Douglas, who then directed the institute, and Melody Nichols, the institute's administrative assistant, for their help and encouragement. Others at William & Mary helped support us in producing the manuscript. Felicia Burton of the Faculty Support Center worked with us and many of the contributors. Several research assistants tracked down citations, made sure that the notes conformed to Duke University Press guidelines, and helped prepare the index. Thanks, in particular, to Stacy Haney. Finally, thanks are owed to Miriam Angress and the production team at Duke University Press.
