

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book would not exist if not for the guidance and enthusiasm of my advisor, Hai Ren, my graduate-assistant supervisor, Ellen Berry, and my program chair, Don McQuarie, all of whom served on my dissertation committee in American culture studies at Bowling Green State University.

Second, I am grateful for the assistance of Duke University Press. Ken Wissoker, Courtney Berger, and the anonymous reviewers of my manuscript functioned as a model of what the ideal editorial process should be: they challenged and inspired me to transcend my limitations.

I would like to thank my friends at Reconstruction (<http://reconstruction.eserver.org>) for providing me a community of peers with whom I could develop new ideas. I am also indebted to Matthew Wolf-Meyer, a great friend and collaborator. A discussion of minimalism that takes place in a footnote originally appeared in “Navigating the Starless Night: Reading the Auto/bio/geography: Meaning-Making,” an introduction for Reconstruction 2.3 (summer 2002) that I coauthored with Wolf-Meyer. I have also repurposed a brief segment of my writing on handheld electronic games from “Allegorical Reductions and Social Reconstructions,” our introduction to Reconstruction 6.1 (winter 2006).

I must thank Ellen Berry (again) and Carol Siegel for inviting me to join the exciting world of Rhizomes (<http://www.rhizomes.net>), first as a technical editor, then as a guest editor, and now as a member of the advisory board. Thanks to Jason Nelson’s (<http://www.secrettechnology.com>) informal Flash and html tutorials, friendship, and encouragement, my work with Rhizomes and Reconstruction was possible. Portions of the essay “Utopian Accidents: An Introduction to Retro-Futures” from Rhizomes 8 (spring 2004) have made it into the introduction. All the contributors to the issue on “Retro-Futures” have helped to develop my thinking in important ways.

I am also grateful to my colleagues at Siena Heights University for their continued support of my research and teaching.

I’d like to thank Bowling Green State University’s Department of Popular Culture, the Popular Culture Library, and the Popular Culture Association for breaking the field of popular culture studies open for people like me and for giving me the tools I needed to complete this project.

I’d also like to thank Roadside America (<http://www.roadsideamerica.com>) for keeping Xanadu alive (and for sending me a great picture to include in this book).

Finally, I could not have completed this project without the help of Carrie Heckman, my wife. Aside from being a scrupulous proofreader and an unassailable force of moral credibility, Carrie helped to polish this manuscript over the course of dozens of revisions into something that represents me as something better than I am in reality.
