

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many people have contributed to this volume in conversations and in other helpful ways. The chapter on Deaf cinema began when Mark Betz, then of the George Eastman House film archive in Rochester, New York, suggested that I take a look at the film Mandy. Joe Wlodarz and Dan Humphries contributed to my work on that chapter in different ways. The chapter on facilitated communication would never have been written without the inspiration of Linda Ware, who introduced me to disability studies. I am grateful to Douglas Biklen for being so generous with his time during our many conversations about the FC method. My friends and colleagues at the University of Rochester's Susan B. Anthony Institute for Gender and Women's Studies and the Program in Visual and Cultural Studies, particularly Janet Berlo, Douglas Crimp, Marilyn Lambert-Fisher, and Mary Fox, provided a fabulous intellectual support network during the early research for this book. Rochester remains an ideal place for the cultivation of new ways of working across the disciplines.

I am enormously grateful for the intellectual support of my colleagues at the University of California at San Diego, and in particular my chair, Dan Hallin, whose optimism is a treasure. I am most grateful for the insight and collaboration of Brian Goldfarb, David Benin, Val Hartouni, David Serlin, and Morana Alač, the people with whom I have worked most closely at San Diego. Brian, David, and Val read versions of these chapters and worked with me on parallel projects in forging the ideas developed here at different stages of the project; I could not have completed this book without working through the thoughts and feelings of these friends of the heart and mind. Marq Smith, editor of the Journal of Visual Culture, deserves a very special thank you for coaching me through ideas that found their way into portions of this book at points when I had many pressing reasons not to write. His encouragement kept my thinking alive. It was my good fortune to have had Elizabeth Wilson and Jonathan Metzl as close and attentive readers of drafts of this book near the end of the project. Their wit and incisive intelligence were a gift that carried this project through to its end.

To Marie-Luise Angerer, Eva Warth, Astrid Deuber-Mankowsky, Jackie Stacey, Annette Kuhn, Jose Van Dijck, Kristen Ostherr, David Serlin, and Lucy Fisher I am grateful for providing me with especially fruitful opportunities to develop the ideas in this book in dialog with colleagues and graduate students at different phases of this project's development. Marie-Luise and Jackie deserve special thanks for sharing their own work in progress during this process.

As always, the professional assistance of archivists and librarians deserves mention. David Baker and Dorothy Gruich of the Archives of the History of American Psychology deserve special thanks.

My biggest debt is to Brian, Nilo, and Sabina Goldfarb and Lori Boatright.
