

Acknowledgments

The heart of this project lies in the archival materials that were made generously available to me by a large number of people and institutions in Mexico City and São Paulo. I would like to thank the entire staff at the Fondo Mário de Andrade and the library at the Instituto de Estudos Brasileiros, Universidade de São Paulo, and in particular, Telê Ancona Lopez. In Mexico, the staff of the Hemeroteca Nacional and the Fondo Reservado of the Biblioteca Nacional of Mexico, the Biblioteca Miguel Lerdo de Tejada, and the Instituto de Investigaciones Estéticas at Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, were very helpful. In New York, the holdings of the New York Public Library were indispensable, especially its collection of El Universal Ilustrado. My deep gratitude also to the artists whose work appears in the epilogue, for granting me permission to reproduce their work and for helping me to understand why the questions I explore here are still relevant. I especially thank Maris Bustamante, Arthur Omar, and Tunga for long conversations about their work.

A comparative study of countries as complex and vast as Mexico and Brazil requires years of support for archival research, and I thank the Fulbright-García Robles Foundation; the Center for Latin American and Caribbean Studies, the Center for North American Studies, the Arts and Sciences Research Council, and the Deans of Arts and Sciences at Duke University; and the Tinker Foundation and the Center for Latin American Studies at Stanford University for making my research possible. Additionally, I received support from the Whiting Foundation, the Virginia Museum of Fine Arts, and as a Helena Rubenstein fellow in Critical Studies at the Whitney Museum of American Art, in the Independent Study Program. The New Beginnings faculty seminar at the John Hope Franklin Center at Duke provided both time for writing and the opportunity to discuss ethics with colleagues from across the university.

Mary Louise Pratt, Claire F. Fox, Lúcia de Sá, and Edward Sullivan first guided me through my dissertation, and I continue to count on their insight and counsel. In Mexico City, Gabriela Cano, Alejandro Castellanos, Alfonso Colorado, Mónica Mayer, Renato González Mello, and Pablo Ortiz Monasterio, were very generous with their time and their knowledge. In São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, Marcos Moraes shared his extensive knowledge of everything Mário de Andrade, and Tânia Dias shared her expertise in Brazilian literature, critical theory, and even her home. Thanks too to Willi Bolle, who first read my work on Mário de Andrade, and to Paulo Herkenhoff for wide-ranging conversations. At Duke, I thank my colleagues in Romance studies and art, art history, and visual studies for truly supporting both the spirit and pragmatics of interdisciplinary inquiry. Special thanks to Roberto Dainotto, Margaret Greer, Francisco-J. Hernández Adrián, Patricia Leighten, Walter Mignolo, Diane Nelson, Kristine Stiles, Antonio Viego, and Priscilla Wald. Marc Schachter, Roberto Tejada, and Jocelyn Olcott read portions of this book with great care. Ken Wissoker at Duke University Press provided crucial support for this project, as did Mandy Earley.

Laura Carton, Soledad Galvez, Alia Hasan-Khan, Anna Indych-López, Susan Kelly, Hilary Czarda, Stephen Morton, Orit Raff, and Allison Rouse have inspired and sustained me in innumerable ways. Thanks to the Lasches for a new home in Mexico City. My family, Vlodek, Uliana, and Rachel Gabara, laid the foundation for it all. This book is dedicated to Pedro Lasch, with dreams of past, present, and future collaborations.
