

Acknowledgments

There is something decidedly cathartic in the fact that within the space of a week or so last December I finished reviewing the copyedited manuscript of this book, delivered a baby, and learned of General Pinochet's death—all just days shy of the 99th anniversary of the Escuela Santa María Massacre. This was the finale of a seventeen-year project that has accrued many debts, both joyful and bittersweet.

First and foremost, I thank the people—scholars, activists, and others—with whom I have worked in Chile. In Santiago: thanks to Ercilla Mellín, RAICES, Marco Ruíz, Gabriel Cea, and Fanor Larraín of the Fulbright Commission. My 1990 coursework with Manuel Antonio Garretón provided an initial orientation to Chilean social movements. Members of the Sebastián Acevedo Movement Against Torture provided a hands-on education by incorporating me into the movement in 1990–91. Numerous scholars generously offered insights: Elisa Fernandez, Luis Castro, Julio Pinto, Enrique Reyes Navarro, Sonia Montecino, Germán Palacios, Angélica Gimpel Smith, Mario Garcés, Carlos Maldonado, Sergio Grez T., Claudio Teitelboim, and Eduardo Devés. The late Elena Cafferena opened the MEMCH archive to me. The staff of PRAIS along with Ministry of Health officials, SERNAM, and the Reconciliation and Reparations Commission, as well as the Association of PRAIS Beneficiaries, provided key insights into their work. I appreciate assistance from the staff of the Biblioteca Nacional, Archivo Nacional, Biblioteca Central of the Universidad de Chile, and Ministries of Education and Foreign Relations. Over the years, my trips to Chile fruitfully intersected with other visiting researchers, particularly Kjungin Cho, Janet Finn, Joel Stillerman, Lisa Baldez Carey, and Joe Scarpaci.

Iquique, of course, is at the core of this study. There I thank, among the many, many people who contributed to this study: Jorge Reyes, María Inéz Cándida Perez, Cecilia Castillo, Miriam Salinas, Patricio Rivero O., Nelson Calderon, Marcos Ugarte, Flavio Rossi, Bernardo Guerrero for initial institutional affiliation, and Sergio González Miranda for access to the regional government papers archive. The staff of the Municipal Library, Casa de Cultura, and Obispado de Iquique further facilitated local archival work. Exchanges with people in the state sector were critical, especially the Ministry of Education, municipal and regional government offices, SERCOTEC (economic projects), and PRAIS. Staff of the Regional Museum and the Naval Museum offered their perspectives on their collections. My fieldwork has been enriched through interaction with a number of civic associations, among them the Chilean Human Rights Commission—Iquique chapter, Hijos de Salitre, Association of Business and Professional Women, Association Against Violence Against Women, Association of Tour Guides, the Municipal Choir, Academia de Idiomas del Norte, the Teachers' Union, various neighborhood associations, the Catholic Grandmothers' Club, and the Association of Northern Writers, as well as with political parties, including the Socialist, PPD, Radical, Christian Democratic, and Communist Parties. The Taller de Historia Popular that I co-facilitated with Guillermo Ross-Murray was sponsored by the Obispado, CREAM, and TER. My primary focus was working with the Association of Ex-Political Prisoners of Pisagua, now the Pisagua Foundation.

Outside of Chile, I thank the staff of the Institute for Social History in Amsterdam (especially Mieke Ijzermans for her hospitality), the Foreign Records Office in London, the film museum and archive in Berlin, Lutz Götze, Walter Heynowski, and the Ministries of Foreign Relations of Bolivia and Peru.

The shape of this book was worked out initially at the University of Michigan in lively dialogues and writing exchanges with Beth Notar, Kate Zirbel, Bridget Hayden, Michelle Gamburd, Tom Williamson, Melissa Johnson, Deb Jackson, Coralynn Davis, Abdollah Dashti, Steven Pierce, Lisa Lindsey, Leila Hudson, Mike Schroeder, Jennifer Jenkins, Karen Robert, John Stiles, Julie Hastings, Rebecca Scott, Roger Rouse, Ann Stoler, Sally Humphreys, Ruth Behar, and Julie Skurski. In South Carolina, I thank Ann Kingslover, Mike Scardaville, Elaine Lacey, Tom Lekan, Karl Gerth, Kasey Grier, Kay Edwards, Nicola Ristic, and Meili Steele. I owe special thanks to Andrew Cousins, Kate Brown, and Susan Vanderborg.

I presented pieces of this book at numerous colloquia, workshops, and conferences where the project benefited from engaged feedback. An especially formative professional experience—especially in terms of honing my ideas about memory—was the Dartmouth Humanities Institute’s “Acts of Memory,” convened by Leo Spitzer, Mieke Bal, and Jonathan Crewe. I thank them and the other institute participants, especially Marita Sturken. At the University of Missouri, St. Louis, Mark Burkholder, Susan Brownell, Kathy Gentile, and Karen Lucas graciously offered an institutional home at a critical juncture in my career. This project found its final home at Indiana University with encouragement from Suzanna Walters, Jeanne Peterson, and my other colleagues in the Gender Studies Department, along with fellow Latin Americanists Daniel James, Jeffrey Gould, Peter Guardino, and Arlene Diaz.

I am fortunate to have had vital professional support from Fernando Coronil, Bruce Mannheim, Alice Kasakoff, John French, Peter Winn, Steve Stern, Leo Spitzer, Ana Alonso, Marisol de la Cadena, Kay Warren, Francisco Zapata, Florencia Mallon, María Luisa Tarres, Mary Kay Vaughan, and the late Ken Cmiel, who encouraged me to stick with my “end of history” critique.

The Politics, Culture, and History Series editors Julia Adams and George Steinmetz carefully commented on the entire revised dissertation and the series editorial board met with me in a formal seminar to discuss the project; the comments generated by this process were very helpful in the first round of revisions as I prepared the manuscript for press review. My Duke University Press editor Rafael Allen then enthusiastically contributed his own insights and supervised the first round of external readers' reports while Valerie Millholland skillfully shepherded the next three rounds. Julia Adams provided patient, generous, and supportive counsel throughout this important process. I also thank Duke staffers Miriam Angress, Katie Courtland, Erin Hathaway, and especially Pam Morrison and Tricia Mickelberry. John French and four other readers for the press all impacted this project by providing careful and extensive comments.

For technical support, I appreciate research assistance from Jodi Barnes, Rebecca Shrum, and Kathy Mancuso; help with maps from Tamara Wilson and Natalie Hartman; help with editing from Louisa Castner, Jeanne Barker-Nunn, and Michel Lafantano; help with the index from Diana Witt; and help with Spanish-language issues from Carmen García-Prieto, Lluís Rivera, and, rather heroically, Michael Ugarte.

A project involving years of field, archival, and interview time and travel across three continents requires substantial funding. Crucial support came from the following institutions: the University of Michigan (Rackham Graduate School, Anthropology and History Program, Latin American Studies), the University of South Carolina (College of Liberal Arts, Office of the Vice-Provost for Research, Women's Studies), Indiana University, the National Science Foundation, the Fulbright Scholar Program, the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research, the American Historical Association (Albert J. Beveridge Grant), the Conference on Latin American History (Lewis Hanke Award), and the Dartmouth College Humanities Institute Fellowship.

I have counted on personal support and inspiration from Lynn Hotchkiss, Pat and Piner Stevens, Pati Ruíz, Marisol Figueroa, Kim Scaliatine, Kirsten Dow, Diane Soles, Laura Ahearn, Mary Ann Mahoney, and John, Peggy, and Gene Somoza. I look with great optimism toward the future with my splendid family: Phil, Lluís Jhennifer, Bernardo Jhon-Paolo, Maiara Kathryn, and MacIntyre Loden Lennon.

Lastly, this book owes its most profound debts to Guillermo Ross-Murray, Baldramina Flores Urqueta de Lizardi, Luis Morales Marino, and Mark Somoza. Generous comments on the manuscript in its advanced stages came from Laura Westhoff, Rosario Montoya, Margaret Power, Janise Hurtig, Ed Murphy, and Jodi Pavilack. Deborah Cohen shared a chunk of her own tenacity in seeing me through each stage over the years. Her intellectual smarts, writerly eye, friendship, and loyalty over the long haul have not only productively shaped this analysis but, ultimately, ensured that I have been able to complete this book.
