

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Academics spend so much time working alone that we sometimes forget that all of our writings are profoundly collaborative projects. My name may be the only one on the front cover, but this book would not exist without the contribution of many wonderful people. I am especially grateful to Nancy Ries for reading the entire manuscript several times and giving me insightful and detailed comments at every round. I would also like to thank the following for reading selections or previous iterations of the book and offering valuable feedback: Richard Madsen, Akos Rona-tas, Christena Turner, Joseph Esherick, Paul Pickowicz, Wendy Wall, Christopher Henke, Jessica Allina-Pisano, Eric Allina-Pisano, and Michele Chang. Many thanks to Alan Smart for our conversations about guanxi, and to Alena Ledeneva and Nancy Ries for helping me see the connections between guanxi and blat—and kindly answering all of my ignorant questions about Russia. And I owe Andrew Kipnis a debt for inspiring me to realize that suzhi was a key concept for making sense of my findings. Of course the errors and flaws which remain are all my own, but there would be many more without the probing questions, accurate criticisms, enlightening suggestions, and kindly encouragement that these people provided for me.

I need to thank Deborah Davis, my first professor of sociology, who fostered my interest in Chinese society and gave me the confidence and desire to become an academic. She continues to be my role model for uncompromised excellence in teaching and scholarship. In doing my best to follow Professor Davis's example of enthusiasm and rigor in the classroom, I have discovered the rich rewards of teaching. I thank my students here at Colgate University for their questions, insights, and energy, which have pushed me to think more deeply and work harder on my own research.

I would also like to acknowledge my gratitude to the Sociology and Anthropology Department and to Colgate University for their truly generous support (financial and otherwise) for junior faculty members. My 1997–98 research was funded by the National Science Foundation, while resources for my 2001 and 2004 data-gathering trips were provided by Colgate University through internal grants.

To turn closer to home, I owe my thanks to my family, especially to my father for always believing that I was smart enough to do this. I am grateful to Lara Scott, my sister-in-all-but-blood, for many reasons: for her unstinting encouragement; for our endless conversations working out the relationship between our faith and our work and our teaching; and for always reminding me of the presence of the merciful God who led to me this place. I thank God for my beautiful and brilliant daughter, Lin, who thinks it's cool that Mommy wrote a book but will no doubt be disappointed that it doesn't have more pictures. Last, but most of all, I thank my husband, Christopher Henke, who had the bad luck of being the most accessible copyeditor, informed sociologist, writing critic, and emotional coach available to me through the long and sometimes tedious process of taking this project from its initial conception to its final incarnation as a bound volume. Chris was and continues to be my best editor, critic, encourager, and friend, and he loves me far more than I deserve.
