

acknowledgments

This book has been nearly a decade in the making, and the list of people who helped shepherd it through its various stages reminds me that even the isolation of academic work is deeply dependent on the generosity, good will, and support of so many others. I am thankful to all who helped this project to completion. First and foremost, I am incredibly grateful to the students, teachers, principals, and administrators who welcomed me into their schools and classrooms and shared their opinions and feelings with me. Without their voices, this book would not have been possible. I am keenly aware of the potential for misinterpretation or misrepresentation inherent in any effort to depict the cultural and political landscape of a country other than the one in which one was raised, and it is my sincerest hope as I complete this project that I have done the participants in this research project justice in my analysis of their words and actions.

I am deeply indebted to Michael Kennedy and George Steinmetz, along with Fatma Müge Göçek, David K. Cohen, and Steve Hamilton, whose deep commitment as advisors of this work during its first life as a dissertation at the University of Michigan launched this project. The conversation among these five scholars at my dissertation defense remains one of the most intellectually interesting of my life and set the stage for my return to Berlin to conduct new research in order to reframe the book around the notion of generational transformation. The generosity of my new colleagues at New York University and their deep commitment to mentoring junior scholars has had a significant impact on this project as well. Rene Arcilla, Floyd Hammack, and Phil Hosay were thoughtful and conscientious in their efforts to protect my time for writing. Sally Franson, Nick Gozik, Nina Pessin-Whedbee, and especially Christian Bracho provided key research assistance at various stages of writing and editing. Various scholars, colleagues, and friends read parts of this manuscript or had conversations with me about the work that helped refine my thinking in important ways; for this, I am especially grateful to Richard Arum, Craig Calhoun, Anne Esacove, Jon Fox, Andreas Glaeser, Darcy Leach, Nicole Lucier, Jeffrey Jurgens, Edward McDonald, Ann Morning, Doug Ready, Bess Rothenberg, Ari Sammartino, Janelle Scott, Jeff Shook, Mitchell Stevens, Lisa Stulberg, Jon Zimmerman, and the members of workshops and writing groups at New York University and the University of Maryland.

For research assistance in Berlin, I thank Hendrike Bake, Geraldine Gardner, and especially Katharina Börner, without whom this project would have taken years longer. For advice in the field and help with access to schools and materials, case selections, translations, housing needs, and other issues, I am indebted to Manfred Bergmann, Jürgen van Buhr, Brigitte Geisel, Christa Händle, Steve Hamilton, Georg and Ulrike Kirschniok-Schmidt, Darcy Leach, Wolfgang Lempert, Heike Lühle, Michaela Orizu, Hanns-Fred Rathenow, Klaus Schweikert, Hermann Schmidt, Barbara Sheldon, and Stephanie Wilde. I am particularly grateful to Mary Agnes and Steve Hamilton for granting me permission to adapt and use for this project an interview question that Mary Agnes Hamilton had designed for another research project. At Duke University Press, I am tremendously grateful for the enthusiasm and support of its senior editor Reynolds Smith, and to Pam Morrison, the production editor, to the series editors George Steinmetz and Julia Adams, and to the reviewers Mabel Berezin and Christian Joppke.

None of this would have been possible without the generous support of various funders. For field research funding, I am grateful to the Social Science Research Council, the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation, the National Science Foundation under Grant No. 0202017, the University of Michigan Sociology Department and Rackham Graduate School, and the New York University Steinhardt School of Culture, Human Development, and Education. For writing fellowships and residential or visiting scholar support at various stages of this project, I am indebted to the German Academic Exchange Service and the American Institute for Contemporary German Studies (DAAD/AICGS), the German Historical Institute in Washington, D.C., the German-American Center for Visiting Scholars (GACVS) in Washington, D.C., the Institute for Social Sciences and Education in History and Politics at the Technical University of Berlin, and the Department of Economic and Adult Education at Humboldt Universität in Berlin. New York University generously provided me a semester's leave to complete the final revisions.

While the primary data in this book is ethnographic and qualitative data that I gathered myself, I compare these findings in selected areas to data from the Allgemeine Bevölkerungsumfrage der Sozialwissenschaften (ALLBUS)—German General Social Survey (GGSS) 1996. From 1980 to 1986 and in 1991, the ALLBUS-program was funded by the German Research Foundation (Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft, DFG). For all other surveys, state and federal funding has been made available through GESIS (Gesellschaft sozialwissenschaftlicher Infrastruktureinrichtungen). ALLBUS/GGSS is accomplished by the Center for Survey Research and Methodology (Zentrum für Umfragen, Methoden und Analysen e.V., Mannheim, ZUMA) and the Central Archive for Empirical Social Research (Zentralarchiv für Empirische Sozialforschung, ZA, Cologne) in cooperation with the ALLBUS scientific council. Data and documentation are obtainable through the Central Archive for Empirical Social Research (ZA, Cologne). Any opinions, findings, and conclusions or recommendations expressed in this book, however, are mine and do not necessarily reflect the views of any of these agencies or organizations, and therefore the institutions and persons mentioned above bear no responsibility for the use or interpretations of the data in this book.

On a personal note, my parents' support during the whole process—from forwarding mail and adopting my cat when I moved overseas to abandoning many of the more relaxing things they could have done with their retirement to become part-time nannies—made everything possible. Friends and colleagues in Ann Arbor generously offered a place to stay during multiple trips to Ann Arbor—for this I am especially thankful to Nadia Kim, Nicole Lucier and Dana Shea, Doug Ready, Karen Ross, George Steinmetz and Julia Hell, and Mina Yoo. I owe special thanks to Sean Shahida, a Washington, D.C., landlord who rescued irreplaceable boxes of research materials from a basement flood. Laura Kogel helped me let go of the quest for perfection. Lupei “Lulu” Mei, Bibi Ali, Erin Cocke, and my parents took care of my most precious “projects” so that I could focus on writing. Last but not least, I am so fortunate to have tremendous intellectual, motivational, and emotional support from wonderful friends and family: Gary and Lynn Miller, Jon Miller, Zee Miller and Michael O'Brien, Havva Idriss, Reed Idriss and Meredith Renda, Erin McMonigal, Sonja Plessset, and Laurel Spindel. I can't even begin to thank Shamil, who has done all this and more as a true partner in this project from beginning to end—and whose love, patience, and support across multiple time zones, borders, and oceans motivated me and kept me grounded. Together with our beautiful daughters Aniset and Nura, who joyously entered our lives as this project was nearing completion, our expanding family is a constant reminder to me of the most important things. Everything else pales in comparison.

I, of course, take full responsibility for any errors or omissions in the text.
