So many wonderful and generous people helped me to prepare this book. I owe a special debt of gratitude to Leora Auslander, who taught me to find my voice, express it with care and conviction, and remain fascinated by the work I do. Jennifer Heuer read every word of this book, and thanks to her it is much improved. Moreover, she and Brian Ogilvie provided me with expertly cooked dinners, warm conversation, and easy access to yoga classes in Northampton. Alexis Jahiel and Michael Buckley have been with me almost as long as I have been working on this project, and I cherish how much my experience of Chicago and Paris is intertwined with theirs. They taught me much of what I know about friendship, politics, and the value of living an examined life. Thanks also to my ladies of the archives—Carolyn Comiskey, Daniella Sarnoff, and Kristen Stromberg Childers—whose company was so precious to me during those halcyon years in Paris, and on whose shoulders I continue to lean. Paul Schor, French ambassador to American oddballs, was always available to help with translations, demystify Parisian life, and encourage me to refine my command of Gallic slang. For two decades Anne-Marie Chapron and her family have opened their doors with unbelievably gracious hospitality, and in many ways I came to love France through them. I am also indebted to Catherine Peyroux, whose intellectual engagement has never ceased to inspire me, and whose fire in the belly has sustained and entertained me while providing a much-needed sense of perspective. And of course, my life would have been so much less vibrant without Gary Wilder in it. I would have laughed a lot less, suffered more fools gladly, and only scratched the surface of my thinking about race.

A number of other colleagues, friends, teachers, institutions, and family members have supported me in various ways. I am grateful to Fabienne Bock, Antoinette Burton, Herrick Chapman, Laura Lee Downs, Rachel Fuchs, Laura Frader, Tom Holt, Leslie Page Moch, Gérard Noiriel, Karen Offen, Jean Pederson, the late Jack E. Reece, Bill Sewell, and Tyler Stovall for their kind assistance over the years. Moreover, I have been incredibly fortunate to work in the history department at Binghamton University, where I have been intellectually challenged while also having an enormous amount of fun. Thanks especially to Nancy Appelbaum, Bonnie Effros, and David Hacker, the ultimate friends-and-colleagues. I am also grateful to John Chaffee for encouraging my work outside of European history; to Tom Dublin and Kitty Sklar for making me feel profoundly at home from the moment I arrived in New York; and to Don and Jean Quataert for the endless laughter and passionate conversation their company inevitably brings. Outside of the history department I have been equally lucky. Benita Roth showed me the ropes with wry humor. Joe Keith intervened at a critical moment and offered guidance and insightful suggestions. Aruna D'Souza, Pamela Smart, and Nancy Um have intelligently commented on various portions of this book, and have been my partners in crime and the sweetest of friends through icy winters and verdant summers.

Namaste to the yoga kula in Chicago, upstate New York, and western Massachusetts; from them I learned things I could not find in any book, for I only had to look within. I am especially grateful to Karen Haberman, Ana Forrest, Seane Corn, and Desirée Rumbaugh, and to all of my students in this practice. Thanks also to my research assistants Jaime Wadowiec and Emory Davis, whose attention to detail and joyful company could even make indexing a blast. Students from my graduate seminars at Binghamton University have pushed me to think hard about gender, race, and sexuality. I am particularly indebted to Jaime Wadowiec, Denise Lynn, Melissa Madera, and Luis Sierra, whose energy and intellectual curiosity have made me a better teacher. And of course, I could not have completed this book without the funding graciously provided by the Bourse Chateaubriand, the Social Science Research Council, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the National Italian-American Foundation, and Binghamton University.

I cannot begin to express the debt of gratitude I owe my family. Thanks to my cousin Jon Nemeth and his wife Shari Matras, my experience of Chicago was exciting, inviting, and warm. Riccardo Losito and Giuseppina Minisini have welcomed me into the Italian branch of my family since my very first trip to Europe, and their home has been a haven during those extended bouts of research overseas. My brother Christopher has long been the person to whom I turn for advice and support, and his wisdom frequently astonishes me. My father Ted urged me to study the French language, spend a year of university in Paris, and immerse myself in a culture which has since become my second home. I would not have come to write this book without him. Finally, my mother Elizabeth's generosity of spirit and understated grace has always been an inspiration. She gave me the space to become the person I wished to become, and she unfailingly respected my choices. This book is therefore dedicated to my parents.

Earlier versions of some chapters have been published previously. Chapter 1 appeared as "Producing Citizens, Reproducing the 'French Race': Immigration, Demography, and Pronatalism in Early Twentieth-Century France" in Gender and History 13, no. 3 (fall 2001), 593–621. Chapter 5 appeared as "Intermarriage, Independent Nationality, and the Individual Rights of French Women: The Law of 10 August 1927" in French Politics, Culture, and Society 17, nos. 3–4 (summer–fall 1999), 52–74.
