

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book has been a long journey and therefore has accumulated many debts. While it is impossible to thank all those that have helped to make it possible, I will mention a few here. The research for this book has been generously supported by the Department of Anthropology, University of Pennsylvania, the American Institute of Indian Studies, the Fulbright-Hays Fellowship Program, the National Academy of Education Postdoctoral Fellowship, a grant from the University Research Foundation at the University of Pennsylvania, and The Trustee's Council of Penn Women Summer Research Award from the Alice Paul Center for Research on Women, Gender and Sexuality at the University of Pennsylvania. The writing of this book has also been supported by the Spencer Foundation. I have been greatly helped during the writing process by Kathy Chetkovich, Karen Seriguchi, Laura Helper-Ferris, and Ken Wissoker.

I am deeply indebted to N. Shasidaran and the S.N. Trust for initially facilitating this research and to all the students, teachers, and administrators who so warmly and generously gave of themselves and their time. Many of the students and my hostelmates have become good friends over the years and I wish I could thank them all individually. Given the conventions of ethnographic writing, I will refrain. Needless to say, both this book and I have been enriched and sustained by their patience, generosity, and friendship. I am grateful to Dr. K. K. Kusuman for providing an institutional context for my research. I thank Mrs. Menon, Soja Madhavan and her family (especially Siddhu and Viveka), Jayashree Prasad (and Mikki and Chinnu), and Satish G. and Sangeetha Raj for providing community and friendship. Holly Hapke and Devan Ayyankaril greatly facilitated my initial fieldwork. Devan especially was full of encouragement. Sindhu V. and Sheba R. nurtured me with their warmth and humor. If it were not for P. Kurian, I would have been without a room of my own much longer than would have been tolerable.

I am grateful to G. Arunima, Uday Kumar, and Dilip Menon for their intellectual and personal friendship over the years. In particular, I have learned so much from G. Arunima's substantive research and writing and from the ways in which she lives her mind and heart. K. Saradamoni is a shining example to me of what it means to live an engaged intellectual life. Her own work, her perspectives on contemporary Kerala society, and her spirit have sustained me and this book. I cannot begin to thank Tejaswini Niranjana for all that she has done to make this a much better book than it would have been and for her warm friendship. In addition, I am grateful to Mary John for her encouragement and enthusiasm. I have also learned much from the work of J. Devika and from our conversations. In addition, Ratheesh Radhakrishnan has been most helpful, pointing me to relevant new work, correcting some mistakes in the manuscript, and through his own developing work on gender politics in contemporary Kerala.

Arguments contained in this book have been presented at seminars, colloquia, and conferences at the University of Chicago, the University of Minnesota, Yale University, the University of Pennsylvania, Harvard University, the New School for Social Research, Washington University in St. Louis, and the Centre for the Study of Culture and Society in Bangalore, India. I appreciate the suggestions of my interlocutors and this book is much better for their engagements with my work.

I am also grateful to my teachers at the University of Pennsylvania and Chicago. Sandra Barnes, Peter Van der Veer, John Lucy, Suzanne Gaskins, Nancy Farriss, and Raymond Smith introduced me to anthropology and history and its possibilities. Jean Comaroff has always been deeply encouraging. Her intellectual acuity and breadth is something I can only hope to emulate. Bernard Cohn has since passed on, but I will always treasure the week that I spent reading to him the dissertation that started this book project. As I struggled to find a voice in the discipline of anthropology, his advice that it is all right to think of oneself as an anthropologist as long as one is embarrassed by it was both enabling and comforting. I will always carry with me his example of how to combine skepticism, critical passion, and learnedness.

I owe a very special debt to Arjun Appadurai and Carol Breckenridge. The very terms of this project have been shaped by their work and would not have been possible without it. In addition to what he has taught me in the classroom and elsewhere, the creativity and energy of Arjun's evolving work has been an important example for me. Carol provided one of the most helpful readings of a very early version. What this book has become owes much to her critical and encouraging feedback. Equally important, Carol's spirit, warmth, and continuing encouragement have sheltered me at some crucial times over the years.

The intellectual and personal friendships of Malathi De Alwis and Pradeep Jeganathan have been invaluable, together and individually. I cannot begin to enumerate the ways in which this is true. Needless to say, my thinking about anthropology, politics, and feminisms has been transformed and enriched by Malathi and, in different ways, Pradeep. I would also like to thank Vjayanathi Rao and Nicholas De Genova for what they have contributed toward the completion of this book. Falu Bakrania and Bakirathi Mani have sustained me with their humor and friendship, displacing "India" in productive ways for me, both personally and intellectually. Amy Trubek's personal and intellectual friendship has been invaluable. Her comments on earlier versions and the example of her own work and how she goes about it have guided me through this process. I have also been supported and encouraged by many others over the years: Paulla Ebron, Miyako Inoue, Veena Das, Kamala Visweswaran, Mrinalini Sinha, Mark Liechty, Jennifer Cole, Cecilia Van Hollen, Ann Gold, David Ludden, Jean Lave, Ray McDermott, Bradley Levinson, Dorothy Holland, Doug Foley, Sophia Villenas, and Amy Stambach.

I have had a sustaining community of colleagues and students at the University of Pennsylvania who have furthered this book. While I cannot name them all, I owe a special thanks to Kathleen Hall for her personal and intellectual support. Stanton Wortham has been exemplary as a senior colleague and mentor. Vivian Gadsden has been a special source of wisdom, warmth, and encouragement. I would also like to thank Susan Furhman, Janine Remillard, Margaret Beale Spencer, Lisa Bouillon, Howard Stevenson, Kathy Schultz, Peter Kuriloff, Nancy Hornberger, and Dan Wagner. Ania Loomba and Suvir Kaul have been warm and energetic friends and colleagues. Conversations with Greg Urban, Rogers Smith, Michael della Carpini, Stanton Wortham, Sigal Ben-Porath, and Kathleen Hall enhanced my understandings of citizenship. Ann Farnsworth-Alvear has been a lightning rod of insight and energy. I have also benefited from conversations with Lisa Mitchell, Ram Rawat, Deborah Thomas, John Jackson, Asif Agha, Gautam Ghosh, and Cecilia Novero. Conversations with Anita Chikkatur, Nana Ackatia-Armah, Susan Thomas, Azra Hromadzic, Costas Nakassis, Kerry Dunn, Sonya Gwak, Jennifer Riggan, Jaskiran Dhillon, Katerina Zacharia, Rachel Throop, Rabia Kamal, and Amy Bach have helped me think through the arguments of this book.

This book would not have been possible without my family—old and new, near and far. I would particularly like to thank my uncle and aunt, P. M. and Annamma Thomas, who provided a home away from home, as did Philomena, Benedict, Rajeev, and Preethi Machado. Meena Vari was both cousin and friend during much of the research for this book.

My brother, Rajan Lukose, and my sister-in-law, Mona Shah, have been nothing short of encouraging and supportive. In particular, Rajan has kept me company with both his love and his criticisms. I dedicate this book to my parents; while they sometimes struggled to understand what I was doing in this work, they have loved and supported me in all the lofty and mundane ways that matter. Quite literally, chapters and pages of this book could not have been written without my mother flying in to help with house and home. I can only hope that they see something of themselves and the trajectories of their lives in its pages.

Nimal Eames-Scott has pushed me along when he has periodically asked me over the years, “Is it the same book that you are working on?” and I have had to say yes. My daughter Anju was born in the middle of the years it took to write this book. Along with the enormous joy and love that she has brought into my life, when she so matter-of-factly tells her teachers that her mother is writing a book and has to go to the library to work, her sense of the ordinariness and everydayness of producing this book contributed greatly to it actually getting done. Finally, David Scott and our life together have had to live through the many years it has taken to produce this book. This has been so in the most practical ways—who cooks dinner, or rather, who doesn’t—and in all the ways he has sheltered me intellectually, but more importantly, emotionally. It would not have come into being without his encouragement, love, support, and patience.
