

Acknowledgments

It's become commonplace to say, under this heading, how many people have contributed to improving this work and how impossible it is to give each one the sincere thanks they are due. I cannot improve upon this frequently printed sentiment; this is a book that would not have seen the light of day without cooperation, support, encouragement, and constructive criticism from countless individuals. I name some of you here, and to those who I have not named because of space or confidentiality restrictions, I want you to know that I am immeasurably appreciative, and hopefully not too ingrata. Errors or infelicities in this text are all my own, and are stubbornly present despite conscientious suggestions for improvement from one or more listed below.

I am grateful to everyone who has read some or all of this work, in one form or another, and shared their comments with me. This book began life as a dissertation for the Department of Anthropology at the University of Michigan (Leinaweaver 2005b), an intellectual environment which I prized for the support among graduate students, the generosity of faculty, and the interdisciplinary cross-pollination that characterized my years there. Powerful examples of these qualities can be found in the Adoption, Infertility, and Gender reading group at the University of Michigan's Institute for Research on Women and Gender, whose members I sincerely thank for a spirited discussion of my arguments and material in 2006, and the University of Michigan's Círculo Micaela Bastidas Phuyuqhawa, a node of Andeanist collegiality where I first presented some of this material.

Gratitude of the most sincere sort goes to my dissertation committee members, each of whom contributed their own wisdom and style to this project. Bruce Mannheim's deep love and respect for Peru and its people is contagious, and I have long appreciated his support. Gillian Feeley-Harnik gave me extremely close readings of several chapters and drafts, and her warm enthusiasm has been irreplaceable. Marcia Inhorn's thoughtful comments helped me to pinpoint my own contributions to broader conversations on infertility, gender, and love. Sabine MacCormack has constantly been insightful, discerning, and supportive. Nicole Berry was a careful, demanding, and extremely productive writing partner during the dissertation stage and beyond. Jeanine Anderson, Erdmute Alber, Megan Callaghan, Janet Finn, Sallie Han, and Krista Van Vleet also made perceptive and helpful suggestions on some of this material in various forms. Mary Weismantel deserves especial gratitude for pushing me to rethink and rewrite so thoroughly, and I hope I have done her comments justice. Two other anonymous reviewers for Duke University Press provided immeasurably helpful and detailed comments, and I thank them for their thoughtful suggestions. Thanks to Irene Silverblatt for taking a look at this work, and to Valerie Millholland and her staff at Duke for their outstanding competence.

The research on which this book is based would have been impossible without a good deal of financial support. The University of Michigan (in particular the Rackham Graduate School, the Department of Anthropology, and the International Institute) supported research trips in June–August 2000 and July 2004. Twenty-two months of dissertation fieldwork (September 2001–July 2003) were generously supported by the following institutions: the Fulbright U.S. Student Program, the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research (Individual Research Grant No. 6805), the National Science Foundation (Dissertation Improvement Grant 0109060), and the Jacob K. Javits Fellowship Program at the U.S. Department of Education. My most recent visit to Peru, June–July 2006, was supported by the University Research Grants Program at the University of Manitoba, and I also thank the Centre on Aging for awarding me a course release at a critical time, along with my dean and department head at Manitoba who allowed me to arrange my courses so that I had a semester free to revise this book. Thanks also to the Office of the Dean at the University of Manitoba for financial support for this publication.

My gratitude and warm appreciation go to all those in Peru who collaborated with my research. I am thankful to the adoptive families who allowed me to accompany them in their Peruvian journeys, to several contacts in then-PROMUDEH, now-MIMDES, and especially to my dear friend Maria Luisa Bustamante and her hardworking staff at Ayacucho's adoption office. I also gratefully recognize the assistance of the directorship and employees of several orphanages and children's homes in Ayacucho, and of Nelly Alanya, a social worker at Ayacucho's family court. I very much appreciate the help of the dedicated and inexhaustible Sandra Soria at Lima's anti-child-trafficking NGO, who shared with me her vast files and introduced me to José Alvarado at MIMDES. Professors and staff at the San Cristobal of Huamanga National University (UNSCH) assisted in various ways, as did the anthropologist Juan Ossio Acuña, who helped me to affiliate with the Pontifical Catholic University of Peru (PUCP) in Lima. Most of all, I thank my dear compadres, ahijados, and amigos queridos from Socos, Ayacucho, and Lima, who welcomed me into their lives, and whom I cannot name because of my commitment of confidentiality. ¡Viva el Perú!

My own interests and abilities have been shaped first and foremost by my family, whom I thank warmly and collectively for supporting and caring about me and my scholarly efforts. I am certain that my desire to learn more about adoption as a cross-culturally strong and meaningful way to create family ties grows directly out of being a part of three generations of adoptive families. For teaching me about the importance of adoption and acceptance in North American family life, I am grateful to Emma, Elwood, Mabel, Richard, Edna, Sam, Arlene, Bob, Connie, Jeff, Ellie, Joanna, Alexa, and Marisa. Finally, my partner Joshua Tucker is all over these pages—I thank him for his critical eye as a reader and colleague, and count myself ridiculously lucky to have him in my life.
