

Acknowledgments

One of this book's topics is the formation of connections and communities through videotape. Certainly, the book wouldn't have happened but for the kindness of many friends and some strangers.

I'll begin, as academics so often do, by thanking my dissertation committee. I wanted an advisor whose work I admired and with whom I felt kinship; with Anna McCarthy, I shared inspirations, anxieties, pedagogical strategies, and scholarly methods, as well as gossip, videos, music, and friendship. Howard Besser inspired my interest in the critical issues that copyright law raises for media access and preservation with the offhand remark that sometimes what's ethical and what's legal don't align. (The implication was that archivists face difficult choices in preserving media.) Marita Sturken's research stimulated my thinking well before I met her, and her feedback was always incisive and instructive. During my defense Lawrence Lessig's and Siva Vaidhyanathan's comments were unexpectedly generous, and their questions were generative. Thanks are due to the many other faculty, visitors, staff, and students who helped shape my time at New York University.

To my great fortune, a postdoctoral fellowship in Critical Studies at the University of Southern California's School of Cinematic Arts gave me research support in beginning the process of writing this book. The usc faculty and staff, especially Anne Friedberg, Miranda Banks, Michael Renov, and Bill Whittington were very supportive. Having Los Angeles as my new home also certainly softened the blow of having to leave New York; I suspect I have Tara McPherson to thank for this.

I write these acknowledgments now as a faculty member in Film and Media Studies at the University of California, Irvine—a position I know how fortunate I am to have. Not only a top-notch research institution in a sunny location, UCI also boasts the best colleagues imaginable; I actually look forward to faculty meetings. Everyone has been wonderful, with a few folks who deserve special mention. My fellow media peep Victoria Johnson has been supportive of my work and social life from the start and has generously shared insights into how the UC system works. Kristen Hatch and Catherine Benamou both navigated as UCI newbies alongside me with a great spirit of camaraderie; Kristen, in particular, has become a close friend and has even occasionally taken me in as a refugee from behind the Orange Curtain. True to her name, Bliss Lim makes me happy every time I see her; and Lauren Steimer has been a dove. Beyond my home department, Julia Bryan-Wilson has become a friend and frequent conspirator, and Jennifer Terry has been a fun mentor. I also thank the tireless FMS department staff Vikki Duncan, Peter Chang, Suzanne Wachman, and Kelly Swanholm. And, finally, the students in my graduate seminar “Inventing the Media: Histories of Technology” offered constructive critiques when we workshopped this manuscript in class.

My research was aided and abetted by numerous people, including Caetlin Benson-Allott, Ann Butler at Fales Library, Julia Bryan-Wilson, the Camera Obscura collective, Daniel Chamberlain, Andrea Fontenot, Noriko Furunishi, Rosemary Furtak, Tarleton Gillespie, Joshua Greenberg, Jackie Goss and her Joanie 4 Jackie interns at Bard College, Jeremy and Liz Greene, Todd Haynes, Jim Hubbard, Ed Johnson, Lynne Joyrich, Brian Larkin, Ming Yuen S. Ma, Shauna McGarry, K. J. Mohr, Charles Silver of the MOMA Film Study Center, Sirida Srisombadi, Lauren Steimer, Julio Vera, James Wentzy, Patty White, Rob White and Film Quarterly's anonymous readers, Damon Young, the staff of the Margaret Herrick Library for the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Science, and the interns of the various archives who presumably did the initial clippings and filings that have been invaluable for supplementing my research. For my research on the Vanderbilt Television News Archive, the entire archive staff enthusiastically provided essential access to archival documents and their own memories; Marshall Breeding and his wife Zora were also wonderfully gracious hosts during my time in Nashville. To get the CBS perspective, I had a cordial and frank off-the-record discussion with the executive director of the CBS News archive, Dan DiPierro. For aiding supplemental research, I thank Mike Mashon, Madeline Mats, and the staffs of the Library of Congress Motion Picture, Broadcasting and Recorded Sound Division and the Library of Congress Law Library Reading Room. And thanks, again, to the many respondents to my e-mail queries and postings about diasporic bootlegs, video memories, and Superstar.

For images, Austin Kearsley at the UCI Teaching, Learning and Technology Center retrained me to capture video stills, Henry Shipman aided in making some of the vTNA photos in chapter 3 available, and Caroline Burghardt at the Luhring Augustine Gallery provided the image from Pipilotti Rist's I'm Not the Girl Who Misses Much.

At Duke University Press, Ken Wissoker has been enthusiastic in acquiring my manuscript, and Courtney Berger has been as conscientious as she is charming in overseeing its publication. Pam Morrison has been a pro as my managing editor, and my copy editor Bill Henry commendably caught many mistakes and indulged my prose. I wanted a beautiful book, and I thank Amy Ruth Buchanan for making a book about an obsolete technology and copyright technicalities so graceful looking. I asked for anonymous readers with expertise in the law and in historiography beyond film studies to test this project with the most rigorous standards possible. I thank my anonymous and not-so-anonymous readers for their generosity, careful readings of the text, and insightful suggestions to improve it.

Thanks to my parents for always supporting me, whatever my interests, and allowing me to be, well, me. My brother Grant set the academic bar high and has always looked out for his little brother. Many friends have offered support and distractions; to name but a few members of my chosen family: Marci Boudreau, Michael Franklin, Bishnu Ghosh, Ali Hoffman, Liza Johnson, Alex Juhasz, Carla Marcantonio, Jeff Martin, Sara Mielke, the MIX festival staff, Candace Moore, Nguyen Tan Hoang, Kimberly O'Quinn, David Pendleton, Ragan Rhyne, Lynne Sachs, Bhaskar Sarkar, Marc Siegel, Lauren Steimer, Michelle Stewart, Juan Suarez, Richard Vos, Tom Waugh, and Agustin Zarzosa. Elena Gorfinkel has been one of my intellectual mentors, and we have shared hours of smut mongering, dancing, and haircuts during our years of friendship. Jose Freire's authoritative pronouncements never fail to amuse or educate, and his kindness has been immeasurable. Joe Wlodarz has read many drafts of many things and shared many a night of cocktails. Dean Otto has kept me true to my sentimental hometown (Minneapolis) and repeatedly shared his house as my vacation home. Finally, I dedicate this book to Allison McCracken, who has been my confidante and cheerleader from the beginning of this project through its completion—and I hope from here forward.
