

EDITORS' ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

WE APPRECIATE THE MANY PEOPLE who supported us in this project and regret that only a few who made direct contributions will be noted here. We would like to begin by thanking the Women's Studies Department at the University of Hawai'i, particularly Aya Kimura and Meda Chesney-Lind, for organizing and holding a colloquium in honor of S. Ann Dunham. Meda also put us in touch with Shirley Daniels, director of the University of Hawai'i Center for International Business Education and Research (CIBER), which funded the intensive editing period. We greatly appreciate this funding, which made it possible for us to accomplish the work in record time. In the early stages Jan Rensel and the late Nina Etkin were helpful with general advice about the editing process and approaching and selecting a publisher. Unfortunately Nina will never see the final product. We are also grateful for the facilities, office space, and occasional clerical assistance provided by the Department of Anthropology at the University of Hawai'i. Geoff White, as chair of the department, has been supportive from the beginning and was instrumental in putting officials in the American Anthropological Association (AAA) together with us so that we could arrange the panel at the annual conference in Philadelphia at which the book will be launched. Elaine Nakahashi, as usual in her job as secretary and virtual manager of the department, creates a work environment that is both friendly and conducive to productivity. We will never forget how she stayed after work one day to keep the copy room open while we printed out the very first copy of the new manuscript. Marti Kerton, administrative and fiscal support specialist, became a confidant and troubleshooter for us in spite of her heavy workload. Our student workers Christen Ige and Eliza Udani cheerfully aided with scanning, faxing, and a number of other tasks that eased our load. Deborah Thomas, executive co-chair of the AAA 2009 conference with John L. Jackson Jr. (both University of Pennsylvania anthropologists), was calm, personable, and generous in all her communications, even though we have yet to meet her as of this writing. And we can never thank her enough for suggesting Duke University Press as a potential publisher and putting us in touch with Duke's editorial director, Ken Wissoker. We thank him and the many people at Duke who enthusiastically worked on this project and regret that only a few key people will be named. Fred Kameny, the managing editor at Duke, took on the role of copy editor for this project and worked with such speed that we had little rest between the time we submitted a version of the manuscript to him and the time when we received it back with his suggestions. His excellent work eased our job considerably. Remarkable for an academic book, there was little to disagree about, so our relationship with all the folks at Duke was great, making the work that much easier and more enjoyable. We know that for every person we might communicate with there are many more working diligently behind the scenes, and we want them to know that their work is valued as well. We thank the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript for useful suggestions and guidance as to what both scholars and general readers might require. Our fellow anthropologist and scholar of Indonesia Robert W. Hefner became an enthusiastic supporter of this project early on by agreeing to read the manuscript and eventually to write an afterword. In spite of his many responsibilities and incredibly full schedule, we have felt free to turn to him with any question or problem, knowing that he would give reasoned, sensitive, and timely advice. We thank Bron Solyom for her archival expertise, for helping us to sort through photographs and field notes, for making the photographs in her possession available, and for general advice and support. Garrett Solyom, an expert on Javanese keris, was kind enough to take an original photograph of Ann's personal keris at our request and make it available for publication. We are grateful that the John Hope Franklin Center at Duke University, in keeping with its interdisciplinary and international mission, has honored Ann's book by adopting it. Maya Soetoro-Ng entrusted us with her mother's work and good name and, although she is one of the busiest people we know, made sure that she was available when we needed her. Her confidence in us gave us additional motivation to make this project a top priority. We can only hope that all these friends and colleagues will be as happy with the product as we are, and that they know how much we appreciate their roles in the process of making it happen. Our deepest thanks must go to our dear departed friend and colleague, S. Ann Dunham, without whose consummate work none of this would have taken place.

Surviving against the Odds