

Agradecimientos

Already embedded in each of these writings is an implicit thank you to every person mentioned in these pages, living on this side of time or in the timelessness of the ancestors. Each one's corporeal and spirit life inspired this collection in some small or grand way. Beyond this, what makes this book fundamentally possible is my familia—de sangre y corazón, especially those I have lived with on a daily basis—my partner, Celia; my son, Rafael; my daughter of heart, Camerina; and nuestra nietita, Cetanzi. I thank you all for your part in creating both the obstacles and apertures in my writing process over this decade (and more), for without the context of this (extra)ordinary Xicana lesbian life, these pages could never be. I thank my sisters, JoAnn Moraga Lawrence and Cynthia Moraga García, because of their infinite faith in my work. I thank my father for his kindness and the example of his unprejudiced mind.

I also thank my students of color at Stanford University—those Native and mixed-blood, in diaspora and in lucha, queer and querying young folks—whose open and hungry minds proffered me the opportunity to think aloud many of the ideas presented in this collection, and whose heartfelt intellectual engagement supported me along the way. Gracias to Jennie Luna for the use of her home in the final days of completing this manuscript and to La Red Xicana Indígena for providing a critical community base in which I could ground in practice my imaginings and political inquiries.

Thanks to the Duke University Press editorial team, including: the assistant managing editor, Neal McTighe; the editorial assistant, Danielle Szulczewski; the copy editor, Molly Balikov; the designer, Jennifer Hill; the editorial associate, Leigh Barnwell, and the editorial director, Ken Wissoker. Their engaged professionalism made for a productive and relatively stress-free process. Also, thanks to Ricardo Bracho for his precise eye and vast cache of political-cultural language as indexer.

And, finally, I thank Stuart Bernstein, my friend and agent, for his tenacity and uncompromising loyalty to my vision, even when it doesn't please the "market." As he is a rare find, I thank Helena Viramontes for finding him for me.
