

Preface and Acknowledgments

Growing up in Rio de Janeiro under the military regime, I experienced two parallel realities that left strong impressions on me: on the one hand, the arrest of my friends from the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro during the street demonstrations against the dictatorship; on the other, our gatherings on the sands of Ipanema Beach, where we witnessed the era's evolving counterculture. During my years as a journalist, my inquisitive nature led me to learn more about this period in Brazilian history. My involvement with the visual arts as an art historian, which did not come until much later, gave me the opportunity to bring together these two disparate realities: the reaction against the military regime and the artistic production of that time. At its core, this book is the result of my interest in both worlds and of my need to reconcile them.

Many people helped me along the way, and I am grateful to have the opportunity to acknowledge them. First of all, I owe a debt of gratitude to Frederico Morais, who granted me long and patient interviews and shared personal materials from his private archives, confirming that there was a fascinating story to be told about the intersection of art and politics under the Brazilian dictatorship. Morais was a pivotal player during the period as a curator and art critic, and during our many interviews at his home in the bohemian neighborhood of Santa Tereza his cooperation and generosity were invaluable.

Central to this project were the indispensable oral testimonies given by the artists Artur Barrio, Antonio Manuel, and Cildo Meireles, whose works I discuss in depth in this book. I thank them for sharing their life stories during our many interviews as well as for making available visual and written materials from their private archives. Their assistance was essential, and this book would not have been possible without it.

My doctoral dissertation advisor, Katherine Manthorne, has been a great source of support and encouragement, and I owe her many thanks. In addition to Professor Manthorne, the members of my dissertation committee at the Graduate Center, City University of New York—Rose-Carol Washton Long, Harriet Senie, and Edward J. Sullivan—were very helpful in providing me with feedback. I would like to especially acknowledge Professor Sullivan, an invaluable mentor who has given me intellectual support at all times. He introduced me to Morais and facilitated this book in many other ways.

From the inception of this project, the journalist Elio Gaspari was instrumental in supplying historical context for the political facts of the period. The sociologist Carlos Altamirano helped me shape and conceptualize the book during our long conversations at the David Rockefeller Center for Latin American Studies at Harvard University.

Many colleagues helped me by reading parts of the manuscript in its various stages and offering constructive criticism: Alexandre Alberro, Tatiana Flores, Ted Mooney, and Paulo Venancio Filho. Some friends inspired me with their own research; others provided ongoing enthusiasm and insight. These include Tony Bechara, Sérgio Bessa, Holly Block, Estrellita Brodsky, Fernando Coronil, Deborah Cullen, Noni Geiger, Anna Indych-López, Elizabeth Jobim, Simone Klabin, Lynda Klich, and Gabriela Rangel.

I would also like to acknowledge all the artists, art critics, curators, historians, and art historians who agreed to be interviewed for this project; in particular my thanks go to Dore Ashton, Waltércio Caldas, Fernando Cocchiari, Antonio Dias, Paulo Sérgio Duarte, Anna Bella Geiger, Rubens Gerchman, Ferreira Gullar, Hans Haacke, Roberto Schwarz, Tunga, Carlos Vergara, John Womack, and Carlos Zilio. Their oral testimonies were crucial as I set about mapping the period.

Christopher Dunn's stimulating book on Tropicália made me believe it was possible to write on the Brazilian counterculture movement in an academic context. His book guided me at many moments and helped to strengthen my arguments.

My thanks go to the staff of the archives of the newspapers Jornal do Brasil and Correio da Manhã and of Centro de Pesquisa e Documentação do Museu de Arte Moderna do Rio de Janeiro; Centro de Documentação e Referência do Instituto Itaú Cultural, São Paulo; and the Harvard Fine Arts Library and the Widener Library at Harvard University. I am deeply appreciative of Nani Rubin for her research into O Globo's archives; of Ariane Figueiredo, from Projeto Hélio Oiticica, Rio de Janeiro; and of Jenny Tobias at the library of the Museum of Modern Art, New York.

My deepest and most sincere gratitude goes to my copyeditor, Amy Gordon, who guided me throughout this project, helped me define and clarify ideas, offered me support, and kept me going all the way through this process. Her input is immeasurable; her editing, impeccable.

I have been blessed with a publisher, Ken Wissoker at Duke University Press, who trusted me during the early stages of this manuscript and guided me until its end; he has shown me the true value of patience and perseverance, and there is no doubt that he made this book into a much more ambitious and better project than I had initially envisioned. Also at Duke University Press, Jade Brooks, the editorial associate, and Mark A. Mastromarino, the assistant managing editor, provided valuable editorial support.

I was fortunate to have received a Jorge Paulo Lemann Visiting Scholar Fellowship at the David Rockefeller Center for Latin American Studies at Harvard University in 2008–9, an opportunity at a crucial moment to think about, research, and give form to this project. The generosity of the staff at the center, along with the intellectual stimulation provided by my exchanges with other fellows, was critical for the development of this book.

I extend my heartfelt gratitude to the numerous individuals who lent pictures and helped me to secure image rights; the rich illustrations in the following pages are a result of their important contributions. In particular I would like to acknowledge Marcelo Mattos Araújo, Artur Barrio, Miguel Rio Branco, Graciela Carnevale, Tadeu Chiarelli, Pedro Oswaldo Cruz, Bernardo Dasmaceno, Ariane Figueiredo, Natasha Barzaghi Geenen, Luiz Alphonso Guimarães, Nelson Leirner, Rui Moreira Leite, Antonio Manuel, Marli Matsumoto, Cildo Meireles, André Millan, Wilton Montenegro, Cristina B. Motta, Drazen Pantic, Paula Pape, Iara Pimenta, César Oiticica, Júlia Rebouças, Daniel Roesler, Cláudio Tozzi, Carlos Zilio, and Carmen Zilio. Additionally, Edgar Almaguer helped me organize the images and obtain copyright permissions.

Special support also came from John Jay College of Criminal Justice of the City University of New York, particularly from Provost Jane P. Bowers, whose generous grant helped me to acquire images and copyrights. A grant by PSC-CUNY for the reproduction of color images also provided indispensable financial help. Many thanks are also due the chair of the Department of Art and Music, Lisa Farrington. Claire Montgomery, the director of Location One, was also a supporter throughout this process.

Finally, I would like to thank my parents, Arnaldo and Loris Calirman, for a lifetime of unwavering encouragement and for instilling curiosity in me, and my sisters, Andrea and Danielle Calirman, for their reassurance and sense of humor. I would never have been able to complete this project without the understanding and support of my daughter, Ana Carolina Geiger. Without her unconditional love, this book would not exist.

I dedicate this book to Joe Friedman, who patiently kept waiting for so long. Joe: I do!!!
