

Acknowledgments

This book is a product of many people, places, and conversations. It has accrued a ridiculous number of debts, and it's my pleasure to acknowledge some of them.

In these hard times in state universities, I am acutely conscious of all those who have contributed to building the material infrastructure that makes scholarly research possible. At the University of Arizona (UA), thanks to the Social and Behavioral Sciences Research Institute, the Center for Latin American Studies, the International Affairs Office, the Southwest Institute for Research on Women, and the donors of the Magellan Circle and the Women's Studies Advisory Committee, who supported my research and conference travel. Thanks too to the many colleagues and friends at UA who supported this project in myriad ways, from discussions over shared meals or when hiking and working out, or by generously reading, listening to, and discussing drafts: Adele Barker, Adela Licona, Mimi Petro, Liz Oglesby, Linda Green, Tsianina Lomawaima, Ruth Dickstein, my colleagues in the Department of Gender and Women's Studies, the Citizenship and Public Cultures reading group, the Department of History, and the Institute for LGBT Studies. Some of my best teachers and colleagues have been, in fact, graduate students—Karin Friedrich, Araceli Masterson, Lucy Lee Blaney, Wendy Vogt, Lauren Carruth, Wendy Sampson, Kate Goldade, Erin Durbin, Mari Galup, and Adrian Flores have all contributed to this project in ways large and small. Thanks, too, to Stephanie Sams and Robert Merideth for hard labor getting the manuscript ready for publication.

I am particularly grateful to the Tepoztlán Institute for Transnational History, a remarkable group of scholars who not only taught me a tremendous amount of Latin American history but also reshaped my understanding of the possibilities of scholarly collaboration. I couldn't hope for sharper readers, more supportive colleagues, or better friends (or more excellent tequila). My thanks especially to Pamela Voekel, Bethany Moreton, Gladys McCormick, David Kazanjian, Josie Saldaña, Ann Rubenstein, Micol Siegel, Elliott Young, Jocelyn Olcott, Nicole Guidotti-Hernández, and Beth Haas.

Some of my most profound intellectual debts are to the remarkable activists and intellectuals in Latin America who have searched for lost children or tried to imagine a world where mothers are less likely to lose them. The Mexico-North Transnationalism Foundation funded a summer's fellowship in Mexico. In Mexico City, I benefited immensely from the lively and incredibly smart feminist intellectual communities: the Debate Feminista collective; the Program in Gender Studies at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, in particular Marisa Belausteguigoitia and Lucía Melgar; to Patricia Vega and Gabriela Cano, who opened their homes and libraries to me. Thanks to the many friends and teachers I found in an unforgettable week in the Zapatista community at Oventic, much of it spent in political conversation. In Guatemala, J. T. Way was an invaluable conversation partner and friend. The Centro de Investigaciones Regionales de Mesoamerica (CIRMA) maintains a remarkable archive that has assisted countless researchers; it is one of the sites in Guatemala where people have fought to insist that memory matters. Marco Garavito has been a tireless advocate for the children lost in Guatemala during the civil war through the nongovernmental organization Todos por el Reencuentro. Ila Abernathy and her Guatemala Project at St. Michael's Episcopal Church in Tucson, Arizona, arranged for me to walk through majority-Ixil highland communities forced to flee during the war, from whom numbers of children were disappeared. Thanks to members of the Comunidades de Poblaciones en Resistencia, who opened their homes and shared their stories. In El Salvador, Darcy Alexandra helped open doors, and I am particularly grateful to Jon Cortina, S. J., and Zaira Navas at the Asociación Pro-Búsqueda de Niñas y Niños Desaparecidos, who helped me understand the broad political and human stakes in searching for disappeared children.

provided writing time for this book, and the humanities center seminar provided a close reading of chapter 1. Thanks to Susie Porter and Beth Clement for conversation and ideas, and to Kathryn Stockton and Shelley White for excellent adventures. Lisa Duggan, honorary Utahn, and Kathryn read drafts and listened patiently as I tried to figure out how to write them.

The Frances and Kenneth Eisenberg Institute for Historical Studies at the University of Michigan also provided a fellowship and excellent intellectual community. At the University of Michigan, in that visit and others, I benefited from the insights of Ann Stoler, Elizabeth Roberts, Jessaca Leina-weaver, Marcia Inhorn, Geoff Eley, Regina Morantz-Sanchez, Kathleen Canning, Mary Kelley, Phil Deloria, Fernando Coronil, and Alex Stern, most of whom read or listened to drafts, and all of whom did me the tremendous honor and favor of arguing with my ideas and historical accounts.

I have been lucky to find readers, colleagues, and friends among the people who work on adoption in the United States and Canada, including Karen Balcolm, Karen Dubinsky, Ellen Herman, Lisa Cartwright, and Rickie Solinger. I have also been generously and rigorously pushed by adoption scholars in Latin America and Europe, especially Diana Marre and Claudia Fonseca. Margaret Cerullo shared the GLDF files from the “Foster Equality” fight in Massachusetts.

Closer to home, thanks to Ana Ortiz, Maribel Ortiz, and Priscilla Palacios for their invaluable roles in nudging this book into existence. My greatest debt is to Jennifer Nye, who was unstintingly generous about this book, offered support and criticism at just the right times, and sometimes treated the writing of it as a problem akin to the flu, requiring meals and help with basic tasks of daily living. As a civil rights lawyer, she helped me see the way family law and Indian law provide the backbone of these questions. She has listened to every word of this—as ideas, as writing problems, as text—edited it, and finally made it a much better book.
