Although I must face the fact that I have really grown up now, I can happily say that my early experiences as a graduate student still stir me. Helene Moglen, Page duBois, Hayden White, and Patricia Patterson took my hand, my eyes, my mind, and more and said “Look.” I said “Thanks,” and I am still saying “Thanks,” and I plan to keep on saying “Thanks” for a very long time.

Della Pollock, Joy Kasson, and Jacquelyn D. Hall read this book long before it was a book and continued reading until it became a book. Their help was smart, critical, and joyful. They have perfected the art of saying the painful things without pain (well, without so much pain). A special star shines over Della. Amy Ruth Buchanan is as brilliant as she is willing, and she is extremely willing. In addition to being the ideal travel companion (on-call photo critic, server of tea, itinerary enthusiast), she has listened to all of the ideas in this book and has consistently provided me with her own solid readings and observations. (She has a star, too.) Jane Blocker told me to take a whole chapter out of this book and I did. Of course I did. Everyone who knows Jane knows what I am talking about. Elin is elin. She makes the world meaningful and beautiful.

I always brag about my editor, Ken Wissoker, shamelessly dragging out the “my” part. I cannot help it. But even beyond his impressive reputation, Ken is truly a spectacular editor. Most people only dream of having an editor so smart, so thoughtful, so responsive, so enthusiastic, so perfectly opinionated. And if that were not enough, he is also a dear friend. Only Ken could be both with such absolute integrity.

Jennifer Bauer, Elizabeth Howie, and Benjamin Harvey did a lot of the tedious work for this book and they probably have no idea how lucky I was to have them at my side. My heart especially goes out to poor Jennifer, who actually said yes when I asked her if I could read the entire book aloud to her. (In case you are worried about further abuse, she is currently safely abroad, busily researching in Scotland.)

Of course, there are many more who helped me. Susan Stewart read an early draft of the book and kept me on track. Richard Howard made the effort to sit way up front when I presented a version of this book's third chapter, "Sapphic Narcissa." To put it mildly, he is an active listener—all of his laughs and oohs and aahs will keep me going for a long time. And he was kind enough to open himself up to my greedy desire to know more about Roland Barthes. He made me overflow with satisfaction. Jennifer Doyle, Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Alison Ferris, Corinna Durland, Martin Durrant, Melanie Pipes, Rachel Frew, James Kincaid, John Williams, Laura André, Peggy Quinn, Lindsay Fulenwider, Jerry Blow, Mark Haworth-Booth, Mary Kelly, David Hart, Mary Sheriff, Patricia Failing, Betty and George Woodman, and Ursula Slavick have given much to me (and by much, I mean everything from the toughest intellectual questions to the perfect chocolate chip cookie—and by the way, Laura, you give both). Jenni Holder is possibly one of the most patient and sensitive people I have ever encountered.

Thanks go to the University of North Carolina's Institute for Arts and Humanities for granting me valuable research time while writing this book. Generous funds for obtaining pictures and the rights to reproduce them were provided through University Research Council Grants as well as a Scholarly Publications and Artistic Exhibitions and Performances Grant.

Thanks to my mother and father. Their unfaltering belief in me, which began when I was so small, so long ago, has turned out to be the most precious gift.

Thanks to Oliver for his love, his Peter Pan wit, his cleverness and red hair. Thanks to Ambrose for his love, laughing all the time, drawing birds, and being wise. Thanks to Augustine for his little pats on the back and winning ways and for traveling so well while still inside while I was gathering what is inside this book.

Again, my love to Kevin. Again, all kinds of it. May it always be so.
