Though writing can often feel like a solitary pursuit, I am quite aware that I did not create this book on my own. I am deeply grateful for the institutional support, intellectual stimulation, and plain old encouragement I have received along the way.

I most likely would never have found my way to political theory or discovered its many pleasures and challenges were it not for the tremendous good fortune of crossing paths with Peter Euben and Wendy Brown early in my undergraduate studies at the University of California, Santa Cruz. I can still recall the excitement I felt every time I attended Euben's legendary, manic "Political Freedom" class and the inquisitiveness and ambition that Brown's demanding seminars awakened in me. I am grateful to both of them for showing me what engaged scholarship and teaching look like and for encouraging me to see graduate school and an academic career as real possibilities in my life.

I began this project at Northwestern University, as a member of a lively and growing political theory community there. Linda Zerilli was an invaluable interlocutor and critic, tirelessly reading and discussing many drafts of this project in its early stages. Her rigorous intellectual engagement with my ideas was invigorating, flattering, and exhausting. My work today is better for it. Bonnie Honig also provided sharp commentary and expert guidance. Her original, incisive readings of texts and events always push me to consider things anew. I am especially appreciative of Bonnie's ongoing interest in my work and her willingness to offer practical advice in addition to sharp conceptual insights.

I am lucky to be a faculty member of the Political Science

Department and Gender Studies program at the University of Utah, where I am surrounded by talented and interesting colleagues and students. I am especially indebted to Mark Button, who read the complete manuscript and offered characteristically probing and careful comments. I am grateful for our many conversations over the past several years and for the reassuring words he has offered at crucial moments. Steve Johnston, a more recent arrival to our department, has brought great energy with him, and I look forward to our exchanges in the future. Many other colleagues from across campus have also become good friends. Matt Basso, Beth Clement, Ben Cohen, Kellie Custen, Gretchen Dietrich, Nadja Durbach, Edmund Fong, Lela Graybill, Monty Paret, Richard Preiss, Paisley Rekdal, Angela Smith, Kathryn Stockton, and Jessica Straley have all helped make Salt Lake feel like home, providing not only intellectual companionship but warm meals, laughter, and commiseration. Finally, my students have helped me think differently and better about the questions pursued in this book, and they have reliably kept me on my toes.

Many other people have played an important role in helping this book see the light of day. In addition to those I've already mentioned, I want to acknowledge Paul Apostolidis, Crina Archer, Jason Frank, Michael Handchard, and Patchen Markell—all of whom have read and commented on parts of the project at various points, posing tough questions and offering fruitful suggestions. Thanks also to two anonymous readers who provided astute, provocative, and very helpful comments on the manuscript. My work has been shaped in ways big and small by discussions over the years with Cristina Beltrán, Michaele Ferguson, Kristy King, Jill Locke, Lida Maxwell, Sara Monoson, Jeanne Morefield, Chris Skeaff, Matt Voorhees, and Lena Zuckerwise. Demetra Kasimis deserves special mention for the many hours she has spent discussing this project and for providing good cheer when most needed.

Earlier versions of some of this book's arguments were presented at the American Political Science Association meetings in 2007 and 2009 and at the Western Political Science Association meetings in 2009 and 2011. Part of chapter 1 was published as "Resisting Foucauldian Ethics: Associative Politics and the Limits of the Care of the Self" in Contemporary Political Theory 7, no. 2 (2008), and I am grateful for permission to use this material here. I am thankful for critical financial support I received from the University of Utah. A semester's leave allowed me to complete the first full draft of the manuscript, and a Faculty Fellow Award from the University

Research Committee at precisely the right moment allowed me to revise and polish the final version. Thanks also to Duke University Press, especially to my editor, Courtney Berger, who has been supportive, responsive, and wise.

As I have worked on this project I have been sustained by extraordinary friends whose intelligence, humor, and care have seen me through. I especially thank Paul Adelstein, Tony Bianchi, Mike Bosia, Phil Dracht and Heather Huffman-Dracht, Jason Given, Roshen Hendrickson, Martine Hyland, Demetra Kasimis, Nick Markos, Jon McCoy, Paul North, Christine Pirrone, Laura Scott, Mike and Heather Simons, David Singer, Friese Undine, Liza Weil, and Eva Yusa. Thanks also to my sister, Brooke Myers-Awalt, for listening, understanding, and being hilarious. I want to thank my parents, Robyn Wagner and Tom Myers, for their love and support and for fostering in me a sense of curiosity, a love of books, and a desire to keep learning. And to Solomon, who arrived as this project was coming to completion: my gratitude for your smile, your sweet curiosity, and all the surprises to come.

Finally, I owe the most to Mark Schwarz. I dedicate this book to him in appreciation of the wit, patience, and warmth he brings to our life together. He has always believed unwaveringly in this project and, even more important, in me, with or without a book. His distinctive voice and vision make the world more intriguing and my place in it more sure.
