

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Many people have made this book possible. I would particularly like to thank the members of the Organización Campesina Emiliano Zapata, the Central Independiente de Obreros Agrícolas y Campesinos, and the Unión de Uniones Ejidales y Grupos Campesinos Solidarios de Chiapas for spending the time to talk with me and for offering such wonderful hospitality in their homes and communities. I would also like to thank Walda Barrios, Antonio Mosquera, Juan Balboa, María Eugenia Reyes Ramos, and Andrés Aubry for their invaluable help and encouragement during the initial stages of my research. Marisela González generously shared her knowledge, personal letters, and documents pertaining to the peasant movements in Chiapas, for which I am especially grateful. In Mexico, I also benefited greatly from the friendship, work, and support of Luis Hernández, Humberto Carton de Grammont, Armando Bartra, Sergio Zermeño, Silvia Gómez Tagle, Carlos Heredia, Antonio García de León, Julio Moguel, Enrique Semo, Aída Hernández, and Sonia Toledo. I am particularly indebted to Jan Rus and Tom Benjamin, whose comments, suggestions, and criticisms greatly improved the quality of this book. Reynolds Smith at Duke University Press has also been a constant source of encouragement and expert guidance. I also thank Sonya Manes for her excellent work in copyediting the manuscript.

My interest in Mexico and Chiapas was sparked by my undergraduate professors at Portsmouth Polytechnic, particularly Gerald Martin and Tessa Cubitt. Their enthusiasm and commitment to Latin American Studies are greatly appreciated. At the University of Essex, I was fortunate to have been a graduate student of several scholars who have influenced this work, including Joe Foweraker, Ernesto Laclau, Alan Knight, and Christian Anglade. I am especially grateful to Joe Foweraker for his enthusiastic support of my work and his stimulating graduate research seminar in 1983 to 1984, where many of the ideas contained in my work first took shape.

I acknowledge the financial support of the Economic and Social Research Council of Great Britain, which provided funding for doctoral research in 1985 to 1987 and for postdoctoral work in Mexico in 1990 to 1992. The Nuffield Foundation provided a small grant for research in the summer of 1990. I am grateful to the Institute of Latin American Studies at the University of London, particularly Leslie Bethell and Victor Bulmer-Thomas, for the opportunity to develop my work on Mexican politics as a research fellow during 1989 to 1992. I also thank Wayne Cornelius and the Center for U.S.-Mexican Studies at the University of California, San Diego, for offering me a visiting research fellowship during 1988 to 1989. The Center's Ejido Reform Research Project has also generously provided support for fieldwork in Chiapas in 1994 and 1996. Parts of this book have been presented at various seminars, workshops, and panels organized by the Center for U.S.-Mexican Studies. I am grateful to all those who participated in these meetings for their comments and suggestions, particularly David Myhre, Keith Pezzoli, Maria Lorena Cook, Ilán Semo, Jonathan Fox, Jeffrey Rubin, Paul Haber, Juan Ramírez Saíz, Gabriel Torres, Magda Villareal, Horacio Mackinley, Kevin Middlebrook, Richard Snyder, Luin Goldring, Lynn Stephen, Rosario Pisa, Pieter de Vries, Monique Nuijten, Daniel Nugent, Sergio Zendejas, Gail Mummert, John Gledhill, and Peter Ward. I also thank Michael Redclift, Jutta Blauert, Alison MacEwen Scott, Bob Jessop, Paulo Speller, Christine Eber, Charlene Floyd, and Gil Joseph for their enthusiastic support of this project at different stages.

I would also like to thank the interest shown in my work by Tom Skidmore at Brown University and Elizabeth Mahan at the University of Connecticut during 1992 to 1994 and to acknowledge the students at both universities who participated so enthusiastically in courses on social movements in Mexico and Latin America. I learned a great deal from our interaction, and many of those classroom discussions are reflected in these pages. I am also fortunate to have found a stimulating and supportive environment at New Mexico State University. I would like to thank all the faculty, staff, and students associated with the Department of Government, particularly Nancy Baker and Bill Taggart, who generously offered their advice and guidance, and the students who contributed with their comments to the revision of the first draft. My deep appreciation goes to Chris Halverson, as well, who created all the maps for the book.

Several parts of this work have been published elsewhere. A section of chapter 5 first appeared in “The New Agrarian Movement in Mexico, 1979–90,” Research Paper 23 (London: Institute of Latin American Studies, 1990). Parts of chapter 7 have appeared in three separate publications: “Rebellion in Chiapas: Rural Reforms, Campesino Radicalism and the Limits to Salinismo,” pp. 1–49 in The Transformation of Rural Mexico, No. 5, 2d ed. (La Jolla: Center for U.S.-Mexican Studies, University of California, San Diego, 1994); “Rural Reforms and the Zapatista Rebellion: Chiapas, 1988–1995,” pp. 187–208 in Neoliberalism Revisited: Economic Restructuring and Mexico’s Political Future, edited by Gerardo Otero (Boulder: Westview, 1996); “Rebellion in Chiapas: Rural Reforms and Popular Struggle” Third World Quarterly 16 (1) (1995): 39–73. Part of chapter 1 is also forthcoming in the journal Social Politics (Oxford University Press). I am grateful to the publishers of these books and journals for permission to reproduce sections of my work here.

A great deal of encouragement has also come from my family and friends. My mother, Sheila Price, has always shown a keen interest in my studies and research. Bob Curtis has been a great source of intellectual stimulation, as well as a wonderful friend. I appreciate the support of my father-in-law, Eduardo Ontiveros Soto, and the memory of María Elena Ontiveros Nevares. For my wife, Wendy, I give my very special thanks for her love, encouragement, and critical eye, which made this book more worthy of the people whose story it tells. I appreciate her accompaniment and help at different stages of the research, including the first interviews, which we did together in Chiapas in the summer of 1987. Our two daughters, Alhelí and Jazmín, have been a source of inspiration and wonder. Unfortunately, at this stage they associate Chiapas with their dad being somewhere far away. Hopefully, when they are old enough to read this, they will see why it had to be that way now and again. The writing of this book has been a rare privilege, not only for the story it tells, but also for the wonderful people I have had the pleasure of meeting and knowing on the way, many of whose names I have not been able to include in these brief acknowledgments.
