This project began when I first saw Chantal Akerman's Jeanne Dielman, 23 Quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles and was mesmerized by the hyper-reality of everyday gestures. My interest in minimalism and in the notion of nothing happening in modern realist cinema was sharpened during Bill Simon's dissertation seminar and later in a talk with Ismail Xavier (University of São Paulo) who suggested I restrict my inquiry to this seminal filmmaker of the early seventies.

In writing this book I again confirmed my closest friends' generosity. I would like to thank Catherine Russell for reading this work in its many shapes and for her perceptive and generous criticism. From Mark Cohen, one of the world's greatest readers, I profit everyday. His demand that I do my best always slightly surpassed in pressure his loving sympathy for my desire to finish, and him I thank for the final form this book takes.

Several people deserve thanks for the roles they played in this book's early stage as a Ph.D. dissertation in the Cinema Studies Department at New York University. They are Stephen Donadio from Middlebury College and Annette Michelson who facilitated my contact with Akerman and her work by providing the opportunity for a first viewing of several of her films in a seminar on Akerman in Middlebury in the Spring of 1987; my thesis advisor, Bill Simon, for furthering my interest in cinema studies; Robert Stam for his inspired and knowledgeable allusions, editorial comment, and continuing friendship during all my New York years; Peggy Phelan for being a wonderful reader and for her valuable suggestions at several points; and Richard Allen for his usual critical liveliness and love of polemic. I am especially indebted to Annette Michelson for her incisive comments and editorial suggestions. Finally, I would like to thank Paul Arthur whose aesthetic and intellectual affinity with this project occasioned wonderful and enriching discussion, the result of which is now present at all levels of this book. His demands for clarity can only be matched by his intellectual generosity and solid knowledge of film and art history.

David Frankel helped shape the dissertation and parts of the book with his respectful editorial assistance, and I thank him for our discussions on ways of concluding this book. David Jacobson helped provide the missing link between Akerman and Jewish aesthetics. Toni Pipolo and Joyce Reuban helped me edit "Eight Times 'Oui': Toute une nuit and the Rhythm of Cliché," published in Persistence of Vision 8 (1990) and reprinted here by permission. Babette Mangolte sat down with me to talk about Akerman, and seventies performance.

I would like to thank a few friends who encouraged me to think of the dissertation as a potential book: David James, Timothy Corrigan, and Dana Polan made me feel part of the film studies community; David Desser whose detailed reading of the work was crucial in its revision; and, finally, the committee for the 92–93 SCS dissertation award, Claudia Gorbman, Richard de Cordova, and Ellen Seiter who made me feel the book deserved the extra work put into it.

I would like to thank the following people who facilitated my access to Akerman's work. Lloyd Cohen, from World Artists Release, made films and videos available for extensive scrutiny and later lent stills and the prints for frame enlargements. Bob Rose (UCLA) and Michael Renov (USC) provided the best conditions for the study of the prints and tapes in the summer of 1987. Catherine Benamou, Maria Rosa de Castro, Ubirajara de Castro, Aicha Franco, and Andrea Vaucher helped with the logistics of research in Los Angeles. Akerman's distributor and producer in Belgium, Marylin Watelet, helped me with information concerning tapes and films produced in Europe. Metropolis, the distributor of Histoires D'Amérique, and Lieurac Productions, distributor of D'Est, were also helpful. Richard Peña, from the Film Society of the Lincoln Center, was unstinting in his assistance and lent me a tape of Le Déménagement and stills from various films. Wendy Lydell from International Film Circuit helped me with all concerning Akerman's Night and Day. John Montague and John Venco of New Yorker Films provided stills as well as the print of Jeanne Dielman, 23 Quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles for frame enlargements. Bruce Jenkins and Janet Jenkins were extremely gracious in providing me with stills for D'Est and the catalogue Bordering on Fiction: Chantal Akerman's D'Est, an invaluable source. Renato Tonelli, from Hunter College, generously photographed several of the frame enlargements seen in this book, Arunas Kiriocacas photographed the frame enlargements for Toute une nuit, and stills were also provided by the Cinématèque Québécoise and the British Film Institute. I thank my editor at Duke University Press, Ken Wissoker, for his initial insistence that I submit the book to the press. It was a joy to work with him and with the professionals at the Press who made this process all the smoother.

Finally I would like to thank several of my friends who, throughout this long ride, helped with their love and knowledge: Bernardo Carvalho, Richard Porton, Joe McElhaney, Steve Barnes, Ann Harris, Noa Steimatsky, Michael Gitlin, Mary Lawlor, Nina Barnett, Giselle Lessa Bastos, Lu Menezes, Eliane Steinbruch Keane, Jonathan and Eduardo Keane, Eduardo Bia and Maristela Margulies, Bebel Aboim and Washington Dias Lessa, Sara Grosseman Venosa and Angelo Venosa, and Samuel and Sonia Margulies. In the United States and in Brazil they give me ground. To Mark, who writes his own opus by my side, all my thanking love.
