

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

From Wisconsin, to Brazil, and now to Scotland, I've racked up so many intellectual and personal debts over the course of this project that an acknowledgment section seems as tall a task as the book itself. To everyone who made this project not only possible but better, I offer the stories in this book, and the meanings they hold in Brazil and beyond, as a preliminary thank-you.

As with all students who have had the privilege of studying Latin American history at the University of Wisconsin–Madison, I begin by thanking my three mentors: Steve Stern, Florencia Mallon, and Francisco Scarano. I can only hope this book honors what they taught me and so many others: that intellectual passion and a sense of humility are cornerstones of engaged and important scholarship. Steve's work ethic and commitment to building community will always inspire me, and for the instances—three times by my count—when I had to be put “in the doghouse” for being careless or sloppy in my work, his tough-love approach helped keep me focused and grounded. From Florencia I will always carry the importance of not just writing well but writing meaningfully—and of actually slowing down enough to enjoy the process. Franco was instrumental in pushing my gaze to the Latin American countryside, and his constant good nature showed that one can be both a luminary scholar and an endlessly smiley person.

Also at Wisconsin, Jim Sweet strengthened my historiographic knowledge of Brazil and stressed the need to always follow your own compass. Bill Cronon and Gregg Mitman welcomed me into the world of environmental history and helped teach me what it means to tell stories that matter. From sociology, Gay Seidman gave me new perspectives on development and social movements—and she will always hold a special place as my family's intellectual yenta. Alberto Vargas made the Latin American, Caribbean, and Iberian Studies program a warm second home on campus, and Severino Albuquerque provided an equally vibrant space through the Brazil Initiative. What first drew me to Madison, and what sustained me throughout, was its community of grad students, and I extend my full appreciation to Dave Bresnahan, Phil Janzen, John Boonstra, Dave Murdock, Debbie Sharnak, Elena McGrath, Bridgette Werner, Valeria Navarro-Rosenblatt, Marcelo Casals, Adela Cedillo, Vikram Tamboli, Alberto Ortiz, and Tamara Feinstein. Beyond Madison, I benefited—and continue to benefit—from the help and friendship of a long line of Brazilianistas: John French, Barbara Weinstein, Jim Green, Cliff Welch, Victoria Langland, Marc Hertzman, Rebecca Atencio, Chris Dunn, Christine Folch, Jerry Dávila, Frederico Freitas, and Andrew Britt. Although I'm still a newcomer to the University of Edinburgh, I thank my colleagues for their warm welcome, and I look forward to the intellectual exchanges ahead.

Institutional and financial support came from many sources. My fieldwork was funded primarily by fellowships from the Fulbright-Hays program and the Social Science Research Council. Other funding came from the University of Wisconsin–Madison History Department, the American Historical Association, and the Center for Culture, History, and the Environment. The Latin American, Caribbean, and Iberian Studies program made possible a summer award from the Tinker-Nave Foundation and also Foreign Language and Area Studies fellowships to study Portuguese and Guaraní. The University of Edinburgh provided a faculty grant to pay for the indexing of this book and the illustration of its maps, and more important, a reduced course load for my first year that allowed me to put the final touches on this manuscript.

I am extremely grateful to Duke University Press, above all to my editor Gisela Fosado, whose professionalism and buena onda shepherded this book through the editing and publication process. Thanks as well to Lydia Rose Rappoport-Hankins and Jenny Tan, the editorial associates at Duke, and to the two peer reviewers who gave such insightful and detailed comments. Portions of chapter 1 appeared in my article “Itaipu’s Forgotten History: The 1965 Brazil-Paraguay Border Crisis and the New Geopolitics of the Southern Cone” (Journal of Latin American Studies 50, no. 2 [2018]). Portions of chapter 5 appeared in my article “The Last Political Prisoner: Juvêncio Mazzarollo and the Twilight of Military Rule in Brazil” (Luso-Brazilian Review 53, no. 1 [2016]). And portions of chapter 6 appeared in my article “Enclaves of Inequality: Brasiguaios and the Transformation of the Brazil-Paraguay Borderlands” (Journal of Peasant Studies 42, no. 1 [2015]). I am indebted to all three journals for their help with each publication. Finally, I benefited from feedback and conversations at innumerable conference panels and academic forums. Above all, I’d like to thank the organizers of three invited talks I gave in 2017: John French at Duke University's Global Brazil Lab, Emile Chabal at Edinburgh's Centre for the Study of Modern and Contemporary History, and Christine Mathias at the Institute for Historical Research in London. In each case, the talks proved immensely helpful for fine-tuning arguments and meeting new colleagues.

All the institutional support in the world could have yielded terrible research if not for the support and friendships I found in the field. In Brazil, my biggest thanks go to those who welcomed me into their families and confirmed why I want to devote my professional life to the country's study: Anísio Homem and Mônica Giovannetti, Jorge Venturini, Barbara Corrales, and Rafa D'Alo and Maria Braga. In terms of research, I would have been lost without Pastor Werner Fuchs and Aluizio Palmar, whose contacts throughout the Paraná countryside made possible nearly all of my interviews. A special thanks to Vilma Macedo and Anna Rebeca Mazzarollo for sharing the files of the late Juvêncio Mazzarollo; I wish I had started my research a few years earlier so that I could have met him. Across Brazil, professors at various universities pointed me in the right direction and always reminded me to stop and chat over a cafezinho before I ran off to the archives: Maria Lucia Brant de Carvalho, Guiomar Germani, Rinaldo Varussa, Carla Silva, Márcio Both, Francisco Doratioto, Sel Guanaes, Paulo Porto Borges, Alfio Brandenburg, and Leonilde Servolo de Medeiros. It frightens me to imagine this book without my research at the Documentation Center of the Itaipu Binational Corporation, so a sincere thank you to Wanderlei Gregório and Suzanna Alves Martins. Similar thanks go to Solange Rocha at the Public Archive in Curitiba. At less official archives, Mariléia Tonietto provided access to the files of the Paraná Federation of Rural Workers, as did Claudio Rodriguez at the Syndicate of Rural Workers in São Miguel do Iguaçú. In Paraguay, Gustavo Codas was my earliest and most consistent source of support and networking. I also had the privilege of working with the pioneering human rights activist Martin Almada, who helped orient me to the "Archive of Terror" and its harrowingly exhaustive holdings. At the Archive of the Paraguayan Foreign Ministry, Alfredo Blacttler patiently processed all of my document requests. Bartomeu Melià, Daniel Campos, Ignacio Telesca, Ricardo Canese, and Herib Campos all graciously shared their time and their expertise on the history of the Paraguayan countryside.

A profound thank-you to my parents, Alan Benjamin and Lita Blanc, for exposing me from a very young age to the cultures and histories of Latin America, and for showing me how to navigate life with empathy and a critical eye. Any redeeming qualities of mine that may exist in the pages of this book draw directly from the two of them. And I cannot imagine having written this book without the help of my brother, Eric Blanc, who read nearly every draft of every sentence, keeping my arguments sharp and my prose humble. Here's to a lifetime of friendship and nerdiness. And last, but never finally, I thank my brilliant wife, Isabel Pike. Izzy, you entered my life in the second half of this book's progression, but it's as if your happiness and love sustained it from the very beginning. Your discerning intellect and attention to detail made this book better, and your mere presence makes everything else worthwhile.
