

[Acknowledgments]

This book has been “touched” by so many people who, in one way or another, have been a part of its lengthy and ongoing process of becoming. There are no words to describe the paralyzing grief that comes with the tyranny of geography—the cruelty of mourning one’s beloveds from afar twice in one year. During the writing of this book, I lost two of my dearest, mother and my paareye jaan, Farideh Mirzapour, and my noor-e cheshm sister, Monir Mojgan Shakhsari. This book is for them and for my gentle, hardworking, and generous father, Karim Shakhsari, who left us not too long after the end of the Iran–Iraq war, on a day when “black rain” poured on Tehran.

In 2010, soon after I finished the writing of what was then my doctoral dissertation, I contacted Courtney Berger at Duke University Press. Since then, Courtney has been the calm and patient dream editor who allowed time for self-care and grief, without making the process feel like a soulless assembly. I cannot thank her enough for her graceful guidance and her support. Sandra Korn, Susan Albury, the editorial board, and other staff at Duke University made the multiple stages of the process into a pleasant experience. My sincere gratitude to three anonymous readers who provided invaluable and generous feedback. I am indebted to Sandy Soto for meticulously editing several chapters of this book and for her insightful comments. Many thanks to Harshit Rathi for his help with indexing and permissions.

It is rare that one’s undergraduate professor becomes a lifelong mentor and friend. Mino Moallem is that rare being whose “Women in the Muslim and Arab World” course in the early 1990s at San Francisco State University attracted me and many other young queer Middle Eastern students. Since then, Mino has mentored me as my master’s thesis advisor, dissertation committee member, and friend. Her fierceness, wisdom, and genuine care have helped me navigate and survive the ups and downs and the toxicity of the neoliberal academic business. Inderpal Grewal, who “converted” me to the cult of women and gender studies when I was a premedical undergraduate student at San Francisco State University, continues to be a significant inspiration. Taking my first women’s studies course with Inderpal in early 1990s at SFSU motivated me to focus my course work on gender and sexuality, and led me to antiviolence activist work in San Francisco after graduation. Eight years later, I found myself again in the classroom at SFSU’s women’s studies MA program, learning from Inderpal and Minoo, both of whom convinced me to pursue a PhD in anthropology at a time when doctoral programs in women and gender studies that offered a postcolonial and transnational feminist approach were rare. While I take responsibility for all the shortcomings of this book, I owe my intellectual trajectories and my transnational feminist practice to Minoo and Inderpal. Even though I was never “officially” Caren Kaplan’s student, I consider her my mentor. Caren helped me with the first draft of my book proposal and gave me excellent advice about the book. If there is such a thing as teaching someone to “stay out of trouble,” Minoo, Inderpal, and Caren, with their wealth of experience and knowledge, have done exactly that for me, while teaching me to “trouble” the untroubled.

Many thanks to the faculty in the Department of Anthropology at Stanford University, from whom I learned immensely during my graduate studies. In particular, my advisors, Miyako Inoue and Purnima Mankekar, and professors Akhil Gupta, Barbara Voss, James Ferguson, Paula Ebron, and Renato Rosaldo were instrumental in my intellectual growth. I benefited from the mentorship of Afsaneh Najmabadi and Leila Ahmed during my exchange-scholar semester at Harvard University. Fellow Stanford graduate students, among them Aisha Beliso de Jesus, Chiarra De Cessari, Erica Williams, Lalaie Ameeriar, Rania Kassab Sweis, Jocelyn Lim Chua, Fernando Armstrong-Furero, Angel Roque, Kristin Monroe, Nikhil Anand, Elif Babul, Robert Samet, Ramah McKay, Tania Ahmad, Zhanara Nauruzbayeva, Nina Hazleton, Bryn Williams, Aisha Ghani, Tomas Matza, and Marcia Ochoa, provided good conversations and much-needed moral support during graduate school. Neha Vora at UC Irvine, Niki Akhavan at UC Santa Cruz, and Mana Kia and Alireza Doostdar at Harvard were fellow graduate students whose friendship made graduate school much more fulfilling.

My gratitude to Elizabeth Gregory, Guillermo de los Reyes, Dina Alsowayel, Gabriela Baeza, Jennifer Wingard, and Hosam Aboul Ela, colleagues at the University of Houston, where I was a postdoctoral fellow between 2010 and 2012. Elora Shehubudin, Rosemary Hennessy, Jennifer Tyburczy, and Brian Riedel at Rice University were amazing collaborators and colleagues. Yasmine Ramadan, Lamia Balafrej, and Catia Confortini at Wellesley College provided laughter and camaraderie in a “dry town” where liberal racism abounds. My students at Wellesley and the Wellesley Students for Justice in Palestine inspired me with their determination. The “sex fellows” and faculty at the University of Pennsylvania’s Humanities Forum, in particular Kadji Amin, Tan Hoang Nguyen, Zeb Tortorici, Durba Mitra, Hsiao-Wen Cheng, Heather Love, and James English, provided stimulating conversations and rigorous critique.

I am thankful to Richa Nagar, David Valentine, Eden Torres, Karen Ho, and Kevin Murphy, whose mentorship and support have been humbling. Richa is her own category and I cannot thank her enough for her integrity and unmatched and ethical commitment to junior faculty. I have benefited from conversations with the faculty at the Gender, Women and Sexuality Studies Department, Interdisciplinary Center for Global Change (ICGC), Race, Indigeneity, Gender and Sexuality Studies Initiative (RIGS), and colleagues in the Middle East, North Africa and Islamic Studies (MENAIS) Collective at the University of Minnesota (UMN). Many of my UMN colleagues, in particular Roozbeh Shirazi, Serra Hakyemez, Zozan Pehlivan, Joseph Farag, Sonali Pahwa, Jennifer Row, and Aisha Ghani have been writing buddies and/or provided good conversations over cocktails and hookah. My thanks to members of the UMN Bodies and Borders research cluster, MENAIS writing group, and the audience at the UMN Geography Coffee Hour for their invaluable feedback. UMN undergraduate and graduate students and Teaching Assistants continue to amaze me. Among them, Qais Munhazim, Simi Kang, Nithya Rajan, Emina Buzinkic, Samira Musleh, Katayoun Amjadi, Hae Seo Kim, Khoi Nguyen, Demiliza Sagara Saramosing, Naimah Petigny, Beaudelaine Pierre, Joanna Núñez, Jose Meño Santillana, Ariana Yang, Kathryn Savage, John Kendall, Mary Marchan, Sara Musaifer, Kai Pyle, Sayan Bhattacharya, Ilana Turner, Nina Medvedeva, AK Wright, Tankut Atuk, and Miray Philips have challenged me to think in new ways with their insights.

I greatly benefited from the feedback I received at different universities where I presented parts of this work. Among these are UC Berkeley’s Center for Middle East Studies; Yale’s Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program; Cultural Studies at UC Davis; Women’s Studies, Center for Persian Studies, and Center for Ethnography at UC Irvine; Rice University’s Department of Anthropology; the Center for the Study of Women, Gender, and Sexuality at Rice University; Feminist and Gender Studies at Colorado Springs College; Women and Gender Studies at the University of Toronto; the Center for American Studies and Research at the American University of Beirut; the Department of Social and Cultural Analysis at New York University; the Department of Anthropology at Texas A & M; and the Middle East Studies Program at Tufts University. I am thankful to colleagues at these universities, in particular Minoo Moallem, Inderpal Grewal, Caren Kaplan, Jennifer Terry, Rosemary Hennessy, Elora Shehabuddin, Nadia Guessous, Victoria Tahmasebi, Jasbir Puar, Lisa Duggan, Neha Vora, Vanita Reddy, and Thomas Abowd. I am especially grateful to Nadjé Al-Ali and Lizzie Thynne for featuring “Weblogistan Goes to War” (an early version of chapter 5) in the special launch of the Feminist Review at Sussex University, and to Gholam Khiabany for his response to the article.

Many colleagues and friends in different universities have provided unwavering support and intellectual engagement, in particular Nadine Naber, Elham Miresghhi, Orkideh Behrouzan, Simona Sharoni, Rabab Abdulhadi, Kehaulani Kauanui, Mimi Nguyen, Wazhmah Osman, Deborah Cohler, Dima Ayoub, Paola Bacchetta, Maya Mikdashi, Asli Zengin, Adi Kuntsman, Abigail Boggs, Anjali Arondekar, Laleh Khalili, Frances Hasso, Sherene Seikaly, and Zainab Saleh. I am grateful to Jasbir Puar for her valuable feedback and response to the book at UMN in spring 2019, and to the participants whose insights have helped me think about what might come in the future after this book.

There are no words that can possibly express my gratitude to Mahsa Nirui, my chosen kin whose unconditional friendship has kept me sane during the hardest times of my life in the past two decades. My sister, Flor Shaksari, and my nieces and nephew, Sahar, Baharak, and Ali Majidinejad, have cried and laughed with me from afar over memories of our departed beloveds. My Bay Area fam, Setareh Sarrafan, Luella Penserga, Julia La Chica, Alma Alfie, Simin Yahaghi, Angelica Patrick, and Sorraya Shahin, have given me love, food, and laughter when I most needed these. Some bloggers call blogs their digital homes. I am indebted to Iranian bloggers and blog readers from all over the world, especially those in Toronto, Washington, DC, and Amsterdam, for opening their physical and digital homes to me. I am grateful for the friendships that emerged, the food that was shared, the tears that were shed, and the fights that made Weblogistan Weblogistan. I am thankful to all my friends in northern and southern California, Wellesley, Northampton, Toronto, Houston, Philadelphia, Denizli, Istanbul, Kayseri, and the Twin Cities and to my online community of friends whose support during the long process of research and writing I cannot take for granted. In particular, I am indebted to Nazli Kamvari, Sanam Dolatshahi, Farahnaz Kamvari, Behnam Kamvari, Aida Ahadiyani, Afra Pourdad, Kaveh Khojasteh, Negar Khalvati, Azar Saneei, Farnaz Seifi, Esha Momeni, Sussan Tahmasebi, Fataneh Kianersi, Leili Behbahani, Parisa Parnian, Ali Eslami, Anahita Forati, Barra Cohen, Samantha Lee, Nasreen Mohammad, Maryam Houshyar, Niloufar Hedjazi, Layli Shirani, Tomas Turrubiate (and the house of Russells), Stalina Villarreal, Nelia Jafroodi, Bahareh Jalali, Alireza Hariri, Ali Taj, Ari Ariel, Loana Valencia, Nadereh Fanaeian, Gol Hoghooghi, Ana Ghoreishian, Dima Ayoub, Bashezo Nicole Boyd, Genevieve Rodriguez, Maxwell Dickson, and Basak Durgun. I am so grateful to Kree Arvanitas for allowing me to use her beautiful art and to Matthew Tauch for designing the cover of this book.

As strange as it feels to thank institutions, especially in the age of corporate personhood, I must acknowledge Stanford University, University of Houston, Wellesley College, University of Pennsylvania, and University of Minnesota. Without the support of these institutions during my graduate student career, postdoctoral fellowships, and tenure track employment, this book would have not been possible in its current form.

And last but not least, my cats, Googosh, Pashmak, and Shazdeh, kept me company, gave me gentle love, and snored away through multiple revisions. They have their paw marks all over this manuscript.