

Most of these essays were written in the manner of the Latin American style of ensayo. Ensayos reflect salient intellectual-political debates of the moment. This does not mean that they deal with fleeting or inconsequential matters. On the contrary, at acute conjunctures such as the past two decades, often characterized in terms of a turn to the left from 1998 to 2015, followed by a vengeful return to the right in recent years, the essay form provides avenues to infuse the debates of the moment with new energy, orientation, or contents. These debates might refer to long-standing preoccupations, such as Latin American identities; the questions of development and modernity; the continent's insertion into global divisions of labor; or that always recurring question in intellectual-political debates, namely, the relation between theory and practice, or praxis. The ensayos might also help bring to light emerging concepts, such as pluriversality, autonomy, communality, and civilizational transitions, the main notions with which this volume deals. Essays of this sort are often free-flowing and as such are exempted from following rigorous academic convention, even if they might be implicitly or explicitly infused with scholarly considerations, as is the case with the chapters that follow. By presenting these texts to an academic audience in the English-speaking world, I ask readers to exercise a measure of epistemic pluralism.¹

Taken as a whole, the essays convey the following proposition: that realities are plural and always in the making, and that this has profound political consequences. The very concept of world, as in the World Social Forum slogan "Another world is possible," has become more radically pluralized, none the less by social movements mobilizing against large-scale extractive operations in defense of their territories as veritable worlds where life is lived according to principles that differ significantly from those of the global juggernaut unleashed on them. If worlds are multiple, then the possible must also be multiple. This insight crystallized for me one day with the phrase that served as the title for the Spanish edition of this book, another possible is possible. Simply put, as I state in the introduction, another world is possible because another real and another possible are possible. That other world is a world where many worlds fit, or the pluriverse. By breaking with conventional premises of the real and the possible, the essays locate politics at this very level.

More than proscriptive, predictive, normative, or even diagnostic, the texts that follow are meant to provide a political horizon in the sense of offering tools for thinking about what to do in the face of the multipronged planetary crisis. They are meant to open paths for personal and collective action in this conjuncture. At the same time, it is important to clarify that the suggested paths are not the only conceivable ones regarding the ongoing devastation, seemingly without end in sight, brought about by predatory global capitalism and its generalized mode of expulsion (Sassen 2014). I specify the contours of such a political horizon only broadly, in terms of a set of axes and principles for personal and collective action (listed at the end of chapter 1), which are far from being a road map to follow. Even more, here and there I insist that each person, group, or community has to find its own way to engage with these axes, such as the relocalization of activities, the recomunalization of social life, and the depatriarchalization and decolonization of existence, in ways appropriate to their own location.

While the volume is indeed a collection of essays, it is also more than that. Its productivity should not be gauged primarily in terms of a more or less cogent theoretical framing, to be developed and expounded throughout the various chapters, as would be the case with a standard academic or modernist text (even if some theoretical coherence is present, especially in relation to the field of political ontology). Rather, the book should be assessed by the extent to which it succeeds in opening up the collective imagination to the idea that a certain kind of politics, an ontological politics toward the pluriverse, is indeed gaining ground in many world settings today. Its value and objective, then, are more prefigurative or annunciatory, if you wish. As the anthropologist Charles Hale put it, the book's main function "is not to analyze compelling problems, develop new theory, or offer a proscriptive program for what is to be done, but rather, to convince the reader to open his or her mind/emotion ontologically, to soak in the energy of so many others in distinct realms who have done so, and especially, to take inspiration from those who are putting those alternatives into practice."² Even if I am talking about a proposal to rethink politics for and from Latin America, grounded at its margins, the call to imagine possibility differently should resonate with all those who question the hegemonic possible, within which a world of many worlds is impossible. By reflecting on the tools and concepts being developed by social movements and activist-intellectuals south of the border, I hope to suggest other ways to think about the possible and the real and to resist the hegemonic operation positing one world, one real, and one possible, while making visible the myriad instances that this operation considers "nothing" or "impossible."

Multiple Reals and Possibles as a Description of the Current Conjuncture

I am interested, in the spirit of cultural studies, in telling a better story in relation to the current conjuncture. As Stuart Hall and Lawrence Grossberg, the most adept practitioners of conjuncturalism, say, the articulation of the conjuncture requires a certain level of abstraction, aimed at making visible sites for effective political intervention. Such analyses are necessarily situated and contested, which explains why past conjunctural analyses, whether in the Marxist or non-Marxist traditions, have often been found to be wrong, flawed, or insufficient. The level of abstraction has to navigate between identifying the salient features of the moment (e.g., environmental crisis, skyrocketing inequality, heightened racism and xenophobia), on the one hand, and their relation to the longue durée of the epoch (e.g., heteropatriarchy, capitalism, coloniality, modernity, racism, Western civilization, or what have you), on the other. Given the complexity, contingency, and instability of any social context, the task is daunting. I do not pretend to have done any better in the pages that follow, beyond pointing at a set of concepts, arising from a number of social movements, on the one hand, and from academic trends around what has been called the ontological turn, on the other, that help us better to understand today's context. Grossberg refers to this feature of cultural analysis as "radical contextuality" (Grossberg, 2010, 2018, 2019).

The larger context for the essays is what in the tradition of Gramsci and Hall is called an organic crisis, a relatively rare occurrence. I refer to it as planetary crisis, civilizational crisis, or a crisis of climate, energy, poverty and inequality, and meaning. By adding meaning, I want to direct our attention to aspects of the crisis that have to deal with a host of formerly unaccented aspects, including ways of being, knowing, and doing (ontology); spirituality; identities; and culture, emotions, and desires. Conjunctural analysis would investigate the particular forces and sites of tension, antagonism, and contradictions at which this type of crisis manifests itself, and how they are, and might be, variously articulated by diverse political forces, whether of the Right, the Left, or emergent ones. It would also illuminate the spaces within which a counterhegemonic struggle might emerge. The most accomplished climate justice activists, such as Vandana Shiva, Naomi Klein, Patrick Bond, Nnimmo Bassey, and Joan Martínez-Alier, couch the climate crisis in similar ways, perhaps best exemplified by Klein's motto (2014) "This changes everything." In doing so, they articulate climate change as a crisis of global capitalism. Sometimes I extend Klein's title to imply that "everything needs to change," echoing a parallel, but somewhat distinct, collective effort at rearticulating global warming not only as a capitalist crisis but also as a crisis within modernity, that is, as related to a particular ontology or mode of being in the world.

I hope to have shown that, faced with a genuine crisis of our modes of existence in the world, we can credibly constitute the conjuncture as a struggle over a new reality, what might be called the pluriverse, and over the designs for the pluriverse (Escobar 2018). I situate my reading of the conjuncture within a set of dominant diagrams that go beyond capitalism and that in the parlance of Latin American critical theory today are referred to as the heteropatriarchal capitalist modern/colonial world system. This system structures our historical ontology as modern subjects. My main source of inspiration comes from activists of social movements who can be construed as problematizing such ontology as they mobilize in defense of their territories, worlds, and modes of existing. I draw chiefly from some Afro-Colombian and indigenous movements from the Colombian southwest. Their statements, and those by activists from similar movements, constitute the main archive of this volume's essays.

As in previous works, however (e.g., Escobar 2008, 2014b, 2018), I set this archive in conversation with academic trends focused on similar questions. I also show the limitations of contemporary social theory to advance our understanding of the crisis as a crisis of a particular civilizational model, coupled with recent attempts at moving beyond this impasse. The latter is the epistemic dimension of the argument, treated at some length in several of the chapters (e.g., chapters 3, 4, 5). Shifting the episteme of the modern social sciences, which I argue is deeply indebted to ontological dualisms, toward a post-Enlightenment configuration of knowledge forms should be one of the goals of academic cultural politics on a pluriversal register. Finally, I discuss how the active critical stance by movement activists summons us, personally and collectively, into a politics and ethics of interdependence and care as the paths for ushering in worlds and knowledges otherwise less shaped by axes of domination.

Some Tensions and Open Questions

In thinking about providing a context for English-speaking readers, I decided to focus on the relevance of pluriversal politics in Latin America from two vantage points: its relation to more established and well-known forms of politics, and the possibility of such politics taking place beyond Latin America, particularly in the United States.³ I will explore these questions by thinking about the tensions between what, as a shorthand, I will call modernist and ontological politics, or universal and pluriversal politics. I should make clear from the outset that I side decidedly with the kinds of politics that defend a deeply relational understanding of life, particularly through the reweaving of the communal basis of social life, as opposed to the objectifying understanding of life, prevalent in patriarchal capitalist modern settings, as made up of separate, albeit interacting, entities and actions. While the former nondualist ontologies are at times resistant to heteropatriarchal and racist colonial capitalism, the latter have gone along, historically, with systems of domination based on hierarchy, control, violence, and war (e.g., Escobar 2018; Maturana and Verden-Zöllner 1993, 2008; Segato 2016; von Werlhof 2011, 2015). In Latin America, the dominant strategies of doing away with, or at least neutralizing, difference (despite their violence) have not done away with the multiplicity of ways of worlding. This multiplicity finds expression today in the inability of established modern categories to define fully what is at stake in social struggles and conflicts. This is why the reemergence of multiple worlds in Latin America and the Caribbean makes the region a particularly fertile ground for articulating and advancing pluriversal proposals in both scholarly and activist worlds.

Let me introduce the notion of radical relationality. It refers to the fact that all entities that make up the world are so deeply interrelated that they have no intrinsic, separate existence by themselves. Modern epistemology grants entities a separate existence, thanks to the foundational premises of the separation between subject and object, mind and body, nature and humanity, reason and emotion, facts and values, us and them, and so forth. Ontological politics destabilize these dualisms. In both activist and scholarly domains, the challenge to the modernist separation between humans and nonhumans occupies an especially relevant place. The field of political ontology actually focuses on the analysis of environmental conflicts as ontological conflicts involving contrasting configurations of the human/nonhuman relation. As Marisol de la Cadena (2015) and Mario Blaser (2010, 2013; de la Cadena and Blaser 2018) have shown, much in indigenous worlds does not abide by the divide between humans and nonhumans, even if the divide is also present in many of their practices. The question thus arises of how to understand worlds that clearly live partly outside the separation between nature and humanity but also live with it, ignore it, are affected by it, use it strategically, and reject it—all at the same time. That they thus defend mountains or lakes against large-scale mining on the basis that they are “sentient beings” or “sacred entities” (our modern translation) calls for an ontological perspective that avoids translating them into “beliefs” concerning mere objects or independently existing things (see chapter 1; Escobar 2018).

For ease of exposition, allow me to distinguish between ontological politics proper, namely, those forms of politics that explicitly or implicitly draw on radical relationality, and modernist politics, which take for granted the ontology of separation. I should stress, however, that strictly speaking all forms of politics are ontological in that they all involve an ontological dimension: they have implications for what counts as real, for modes of existence, and for adjudicating ethical or nonethical action.⁴ All forms of politics are relational, yet differently so. I sometimes use a heuristic to distinguish between “weak relationality” and “strong relationality.” In the former, characteristic of modernist politics, entities are first assumed to be ontologically separate; then they are reunited through some sort of connection, such as a “network,” but even when this is done, it is clear that the entities, now found to be related, preexist the connection. More importantly, modernist forms of politics stem from ontologies that are deeply embedded in the negation of the full humanity of multiple others and the nonhuman, and this has to be taken seriously into account when considering them as strategies for action. In radical ontological politics, by contrast, there are no intrinsically existing entities to be found, since nothing preexists the relations that constitute it; in other words, reality is relational through and through. Throughout the book, the reader will find ample instances of such nondualist ontologies and their corresponding pluriversal forms of politics.

I would like here first to examine the relations between pluriversal politics, on the one hand, and modernist forms of politics intended to effect progressive social change, on the other; following from that is a second issue, that of the relation between pluriversal politics and the Left. Together, these two issues raise a key question: do moderns have a role in ontological politics toward the pluriverse, on their own or alongside those explicitly advancing such politics? A third persistent question concerns the viability of ontological politics in actually existing communities. How prevalent and effective is this sort of relational and pluriversal politics, especially when compared with more established political strategies? Hereafter, I rehearse two contrasting answers to these questions. While the first set envisions the possibility of effective bridges between the various kinds of politics, the second, largely drawn from a trend in African American radical thought known as Afro-pessimism, is skeptical of such a possibility. My hope is that my comments will help readers to articulate their own sense of the relation between pluriversal and modernist politics.

On the Possibility of Articulating Ontological and Modernist Forms of Politics

Can modernist politics contribute to fostering a pluriversal politics? This seems to be a key issue related to ontological politics, and it takes several forms, all of them important. Can modernist forms of politics aimed at fostering radical social change (say, in relation to heteropatriarchy, white supremacy, and capitalism) be effective in resisting social injustices, potentially in tandem with pluriversal forms of politics? Or are they necessarily at odds? Do not the very people engaging in pluriversal ontological politics, such as those defending communal and autonomous worlds, also participate in modernist politics, for example, vis-à-vis the state? Can we moderns play a role in the politics of the pluriverse? While I do provide some partial answers to these questions in this volume, and in other recent books (2014b, 2018), given their recurrence, I would like to offer some brief additional comments. I do not think there is a way to settle this dispute once and for all; it will remain an open question.

Ontological Politics as Pluriversal Politics

Let me start with a straightforward statement: I believe multiple ways exist for those of us who operate on the basis of modernist politics to contribute to pluriversal politics even if not embracing ontological politics explicitly—for instance, modernist struggles for economic democratization, for depatriarchalization and the end of racism and homophobia, for environmental justice, and academic critiques. A substantial amount of resistance to injustices and inequities fits the bill. That said, it is also important to recognize that many modernist forms of politics are counterproductive in relation to pluriversal politics; they reproduce and strengthen, rather than undermine, the modernist ontology of separation from which they stem. This is especially the case with liberal forms.

Adapting a broad typology of forms of politics drawn from the field of international development (explained in chapter 6), I would propose a three-layered characterization to sort out and evaluate the field of political strategies.

The first layer comprises political strategies and designs conducted in the name of progress and the improvement of people's conditions; these are the standard biopolitical liberal forms of design and politics, such as those by most neoliberal governments, the World Bank, and mainstream NGOs. They take for granted the dominant world (in terms of markets, individual actions, productivity, competitiveness, the need for economic growth, etc.); taken as a whole, they can only reinforce the universals of modernity and their accompanying capitalist institutions with their strategies of domination, control, violence, and war; they are inimical to pluriversal politics.

The second layer comprises political strategies and designs for social justice: this is the kind of politics practiced with the intention of fostering greater social justice and environmental sustainability; it embraces human rights (including gender, sexual, and ethnic diversity), environmental justice, the reduction of inequality, direct alliances with social movements, and so forth. Some progressive development NGOs, such as Oxfam, and a number of social movements, might serve as a paradigm for this second trajectory. In principle, these forms of politics may contribute to pluriversal politics, especially if they are pushed toward the third trajectory.

The third option would be pluriversal politics proper, or political strategies and designs for pluriversal transitions. Those practicing this option would engage in ontological politics from the perspective of radical interdependence. In doing so, they would go beyond the binary of modernist and pluriversal politics, engaging all forms of politics in the same, though diverse, movement for civilizational transitions through meshworks of autonomous collectives and communities from both the Global North and the Global South.⁵ No readily available models exist for this third kind of politics, although it is the subject of active experimentation by many social struggles at present. How these kinds of politics might initiate rhizomatic expansions from below, effectively relativizing modernity's universal ontology and the imaginary of one world that it actively produces, is an open question in contemporary social theory and activist debates.

Let me underscore that many activists and groups move in and out of the three types of politics just outlined. Even highly politicized social movements, such as those by ethnic, peasant, and urban marginal groups, engage in actions and critiques that can easily be qualified as modernist—for instance, in their critiques of inequality, corruption, and dispossession in the name of rights, culture, access to land and public services, and so forth. Readers will recognize such instances in the statements by some of the Afro-descendant and indigenous actors featured in the various chapters. In this way, their practice could be described as modernist, Left, and pluriversal at the same time. At their best, they engage in the interplay of politics from the perspective of their autonomy and through collective decision-making processes. I do not want to suggest, however, that all resistance by these groups is explicitly ontological or pluriversal.

Those committed to one or another form of leftist politics and alternative modernity can usefully consider the following questions, among others: What habitual forms of knowing, being, and doing does a given strategy contribute to challenge, destabilize, or transform? For instance, does the strategy or practice in question help us in the journey of deindividualization and toward recommonalization? Does it contribute to bringing about more local forms of economy that might, in turn, provide elements for designing the infrastructures needed for a responsible ethics of interexistence and the deep acceptance of radical difference? Does it make us more responsive to the notions of multiple reals and a world where many worlds fit? Does this shift encourage us to entertain other notions of the possible, significantly different from those on offer by capitalism, the state, the media, and most expert institutions? To what extent do our efforts to depatriarchalize and decolonize society move along the lines of liberating the Earth and weaving the pluriverse effectively with others, human and not?

The fact is that we all live within the Earth as pluriverse; we weave the pluriverse together with every existing being through our daily practices. We are all summoned to the task of repairing the Earth and the pluriverse, one stitch at a time, one design at a time, one loop at a time, so to speak (Escobar 2018). Some of our stitches and loops will likely contribute to the web of relations that sustain life, others less so or not at all. Our collective weaving of a place, including a form of habitation, is a major part of it. We are summoned by place into entanglements with each other and with nonhumans, whether in conflict or cooperation or both, as all of us, willy-nilly, live in coexistence with multiple others through intricate relations that define our very way of being, even if most often we imagine those relations as weak links from which we can easily disassociate ourselves. As the geographers Soren Larsen and Jay Johnson (2017) put it in their work on the contested nature of places and landscapes in which Native and non-Native peoples coexist, this confers on place a political and spiritual dimension, which I believe can and needs to be struggled over in urban territories as well (Escobar 2019).

This agency of place and the pluriverse—that they call us into coexistence with others—suggests that pluriversal politics itself involves an entanglement of forms, inhabiting a spectrum from the radically relational to the modernist liberal, and that we are all, ineluctably, part of it. Seen this way, the seemingly firm boundaries between the Global North and the Global South, and between what might be considered modern or not, weaken significantly and, eventually, begin to dissolve. Succinctly put, the struggle to reinhabit the pluriverse is everyone's. As we will learn from the Nasa indigenous movement in Colombia (chapter 3), we are all thrust into the liberation of Mother Earth from whichever place and position we happen to occupy, for as long as Earth is enslaved, as the Nasa argue, so are all living beings.

A second important question is that of the relation between ontological politics and the Left. The election of Hugo Chávez as president of Venezuela in December 1998 inaugurated a period of progressive governments in the continent that lasted until about 2015, when a turn to the right again manifested in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, among others. According to the United Nations, the progressive governments accomplished noticeable reductions in poverty and modest reductions in inequality. However, their policies were based on utterly conventional development strategies, modernizing to their core, organized around the extraction of natural resources. For some observers, despite the reported accomplishments, these experiences demonstrated the limitations of achieving significant transformations within any modernizing Left framework (see Escobar 2010 for a review).

It might be the case, however, that taken as a whole, modernist-leftist policies create less inimical conditions for pluriversal politics than neoliberal right-wing regimes, which, in Latin America at least, are often bent on brutally crushing any form of dissent and resistance. Mexico and Colombia are, sadly, notorious cases in this regard. Pluriversal and leftist politics could be mutually enabling, though this convergence cannot be taken for granted, as exemplified by the repression of environmentalist and indigenous organizations in Ecuador and Bolivia under their respective Left governments. It is also the case that in their practice many social movements blur the boundaries between counterhegemonic and ontological politics. Drawing on Audre Lorde's (1984) well-known provocation ("The master's tools will never dismantle the master's house"), one might say that counterhegemonic politics use the master's tools to push radical demands forward, to the system's breaking point, if possible. This might involve modernist practices such as claiming rights, using legal instruments (such as the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, ILO 169, which has been used adroitly by indigenous peoples and ethnic minorities, albeit with mixed results), negotiating political rights with the state, and so on. Strategies of this sort make counterhegemonic use of hegemonic tools with varying degrees of effectiveness (Santos 2007).⁶

For these strategies to move along the lines of pluriversal politics, nevertheless, they must take on an explicitly political ontological character. In the spirit of Lorde's revolutionary imperative, this would imply, as maintained by some black and Latina/o scholars, broadening the parameters of change so as to articulate their anticapitalistic and antiracist stance with languages and strategies that push beyond the dominant ontologies. From this perspective, it should be clear that principles of struggle such as autonomy, territory, communality, and care cannot easily be accommodated within actually existing Left discourses; while much can be done to advance these causes through counter-hegemonic strategies, they also require an explicit ontological framing that advances the principles of interdependence and relationality.⁷

Pluriversal Politics in Actually Existing Communities

I deal in passing in these essays with the criticisms about the plausibility of pluriversal politics, particularly as compared with better-known Left strategies. These critiques are addressed to perspectives that are perceived as too localist and not infrequently take the form of charges of romanticism (see, e.g., Gibson-Graham 2002, for a countercritique). Emotions run high in these exchanges. I will not rehearse my responses here (see chapter 1; Escobar 2014a, 2018), but I would like to add some elements from the perspective of the previous discussion. Let me start by rearticulating the question, or rather questions: Is pluriversal politics a workable horizon for action? Is the construction of autonomous spaces from below sufficient to even make a dent in the global capitalist system of domination? We speak about recommonalization as essential to pluriversal politics, but are not communal logics central to the subordination of women and youth? Do the struggles in question really embody other principles of being, knowing, and doing, as ontological politics claims? Or, on the contrary, are they not mired in internal conflict and contradiction, thus too vulnerable to external threats and repression to have a chance of success? Are they not often reinscribed into modernist frameworks by their all-too-powerful adversaries, particularly the intolerant heteropatriarchal and economic norms of capital and the state? Are not the territories of difference and the ZADs (zones à défendre, or zones to defend) liable to being reoccupied materially and ontologically by the powers that be?⁸

At the heart of these questions are the criteria for assessing the effectivity of diverse forms of politics and resistance. Thinking in terms of articulations, alliances, convergences, bridge building among systemic alternatives, and rhizomic and meshwork processes of connection among antisystemic movements is but a starting point. Positing the possibility of articulations among transformative alternatives, however, is essential for conveying the idea that, at times at least, they might be able to make a dent in the structures of devastation and oppression. This kind of thinking—along with a critical reassessment of well-known notions of rescaling, the nature of structural change, global/local binaries, and so forth—is crucial so that antisystemic alternatives are not dismissed as unviable, ineffective, place-specific, small, unrealistic, or noncredible alternatives to what exist. Ideas and movements aiming toward the convergence of alternatives endeavor to drive this point across.

The geographers Gibson-Graham have exposed the capitalocentric and globalocentric nature of a great deal of the critique of place-based alternatives. Most of these critics, whether Marxists or poststructuralists, they suggest, “do not see themselves as powerfully constituted by globalization. The realists see the world as taken over by global capitalism, the new Empire. The deconstructionists see a dominant discourse of globalization that is setting the political and policy agenda. In different ways, they both stand outside globalization, and see it ‘as it is’—yet the power of globalization seems to have colonized their political imaginations” (2002, 34, 35). As I explain in chapter 1, this modernist and masculinist political thinking, which ineluctably disempowers the local and place based by locating the decisive power to change things in the global, depends on the ontological assumption of the existence of a one-world world, one real, and one possible. I am not saying that all those who adhere to modernist leftist politics fall into this globalocentric trap; very often, they also endorse progressive politics of place. I am suggesting, however, that the very question of the political effectiveness of a given movement or strategy is laden with discursive operations and emotional attachments that need to be made explicit as part of the process of making up our minds about it.

Moving toward the realization of multiple reals/possibles is the best antidote against globalocentric thinking; it enables us to consider the power of the place based and of local becoming in new forms, perhaps envisioning what Gibson-Graham imaginatively called a homeopathic politics, that of healing multiple locals through communal economies and logics connecting with each other into diffuse, constitutive, and sustaining forms of translocal meshworked power. Telling this story is perhaps not as thrilling as recounting the saga of the great capitalist machine and its potential overthrow, but it is one to which more and more groups seem committed. As Gibson-Graham put it, “The judgment that size and extensiveness are coincident with power is not simply a rational calculation in our view but also a discursive choice and emotional commitment. . . . Communities can be constituted around difference, across places, with openness to others as a central ethics. . . . New forms of community are to be constructed through cultivating the communal capacities of individuals and groups and, even more importantly, cultivating the self as a communal subject” (2002, 51, 52). In the last instance, it is a matter of cultivating ourselves as theorists and practitioners of multiple possibles, even as we alternate between diverse types of strategy. What practices of resubjectivation are needed for actively and effectively desiring nonpatriarchal, noncapitalist, and deeply relational modes of being, knowing, and doing? In other words, we need to disidentify ourselves actively with capitalism, masculinism, colonial, and racist practices and with the ontologies of separation that are an integral part of most, if not all, forms of oppression in the world today.

One might call this disidentification, following the Mexican feminist sociologist Raquel Gutiérrez Aguilar (2017), a politics in the feminine: one centered on the reproduction of life as a whole, along the care–conservation axis, in tandem with the social reappropriation of collectively produced goods (post-capitalism), and beyond the masculinist canons of the political linked to capital accumulation and the state. Or one might speak of it, with the Argentinean anthropologist Rita Segato (2016), as a politics that ends the “minoritization” of women that has accompanied the decommunalization (radical individuation) of modern worlds, in favor of a recommunalizing autonomous politics that reclaims the “ontological fullness” of women’s worlds. For Segato, patriarchal masculinist ontologies, with their foundational binary matrix, not only represent “the first and permanent pedagogy of expropriation of value and its subsequent domination” (2016, 16) but continue to be at the basis of most forms of violence and predatory accumulation. They can only result in a “pedagogy of cruelty” functional to the deepening of dispossession. This ontological mandate has to be dismantled by building on the relational and communal practices that still inhabit, albeit in fragmentary and contradictory ways, many Afro-Latin American, indigenous, peasant, and urban marginal worlds. Let us listen to Segato’s conclusion before broaching the notion of a radical rupture from the metaphysical structure of modernity (2016, 106):

We need to remake our ways of living, to reconstruct the strong links existing in communities with the help of the “technologies of sociability” commanded by women in their domains; these locally rooted practices are embedded in the dense symbolic fabric of an alternative cosmos, dysfunctional to capital, and proper of the pueblos (peoples) in their political journey that have allowed them to survive throughout five hundred years of continued conquest. We need to advance this politics day by day, outside the state: to reweave the communal fabric as to restore the political character of domesticity proper of the communal. . . . To choose the relational path is to opt for the historical project of being community. . . . It means to endow relationality and the communal forms of happiness with a grammar of value and resistance capable of counteracting the powerful developmentalist, exploitative, and productivist rhetoric of things with its alleged meritocracy. La estrategia a partir de ahora es femenina [the strategy, from now on, is a feminine one] (my emphasis).

This is a feminist and radical relational politics I fully endorse.

On the Need for a Radical Rupture and Its Political Implications

We need to consider another position as we try to make up our minds about the strategies into which we might want to put our best energies and ideas. It can be stated in a number of forms. What do we do if we arrive at the conclusion that everything that surrounds us—institutions, governments, religions, academies, even the innermost aspects of our beings—has been so thoroughly colonized by modernity as to make any counterhegemonic use of modernist tools practically inoperative and counterproductive? If, confronted with the history of horrors visited on the pluriverse by the heteropatriarchal capitalist colonial/racist world system, one realizes that not much, perhaps nothing, of what the modern/colonial world has to offer is of value for the urgent task of reconstruction, repair, and resurgence of all, and particularly subaltern, worlds? Would these growing realizations—seriously entertained by some, albeit perhaps not too many, critics, in different parts of the world—not lead us to conclude that the time for a radical rupture and departure from those dominant worlds has arrived? This would seem to me a perfectly valid inference, even if it might make the question of praxis even more intractable. And it is the conclusion arrived at by a number of African American writers.

Before we go there, let me return to Bob Marley.⁹ Let us listen to the following powerful statement on ontological politics from his 1979 song “Babylon System,” which Marley sings in the perfect rhythm of Jamaican reggae:¹⁰

We refuse to be
What you wanted us to be
We are what we are
That’s the way it’s going to be.

One could find many layers of meaning in just this statement; it is indeed about identity, but not only; it is an unambiguous refusal of the ontological imperative to be in a particular way, a way that for black peoples all over the world involves at the least widespread misrecognition, oftentimes outright denial of their being, and not infrequently lethal forms of nonrelation, as in repeated police killings and mass incarceration. One can also read in these lyrics a call to everybody, black and nonblack, to refuse to be what “they” want us to be—they being the Babylon system, in Marley variously a synonym for Western civilization, capitalism, intractable racism, and unbridled globalization: “Babylon system is the vampire, yea! / Suckin’ the children day by day, yeah! / Me say de Babylon system is the vampire, falling empire / Suckin’ the blood of the sufferers, yeah!” It would not be far-fetched to suggest that it is also about whether one—we all—can join in the singing and feel a profound identification with those in dire need of disidentifying with “de system” as a matter of survival. For have all of us not, too, been “trodding in the winepress much too long”? Are we not part of the system he decries and condemns: “Building church and university, wooh, yeah! / Deceiving the people continually, yeah! / Me say them graduatin’ thieves and murderers / Look out now they suckin’ the blood of the sufferers, Yea! . . . Rebel, rebel!” Can we not be, too, part of the active forces compelled to “tell the children the truth,” part of this truth being that “You can’t educate I / For no equal opportunity / Talkin’ ’bout my freedom / People freedom and liberty!”?

The Jamaican political theorist Anthony Bogues (2003) has written about Bob Marley in his book about black heretics and prophets as exemplary radical intellectuals who, operating in the interstices of modernity, have drawn not so much on the privileged critical resources offered by modern critical theory as on the “dread history” excavated from the practices of Caribbean subaltern resistance and worldviews (181). Such history contains “a profound radical ontological claim” that is critical, utopian, and redemptive. It constitutes grounds for a project of “becoming human, not white nor imitative of the colonial, but overturning white/European normativity” (13), precisely as in Marley’s refusal to be “what you wanted us to be.” For Bogues, heretics and prophets of this sort perform a crucial symbolic displacement; drawing on the Jamaican philosopher Sylvia Wynter, he argues that they contribute to “the creation of counterworld ideologies in the context where the black is a nothing” (176).¹¹ Needless to say, race is central to this politics, as Marley also reminds us: “Until the philosophy which holds one race superior and another inferior is finally and permanently discredited and abandoned, everywhere is war, me say war.”¹²

The notion of the black person as nothing underlies the “metaphysical infrastructure” of Western modernity, as the influential black intellectual Nahum Chandler aptly calls it (2014). It discloses the impossibility for the black person of achieving ontological fullness as a human within any dominant onto-epistemic social and political order. It is inherent in the very declaration that “black lives matter.” A common starting point is the virulent and seemingly endless violence against black peoples in general and young black males in particular. The writer Jesmyn Ward (2013) courageously describes the cultural and existential impact of such violence in a recent memoir, vividly speaking about the subsumed rage and accumulated grief caused by seeing so many close relatives and friends face violent deaths. How to speak about such a history of unending loss, she asks, a history that seemingly extends to any foreseeable future, so as to “write the narrative that remembers, write the narrative that says: Hello. We are here. Listen?”? Not easy, she says (251).

Not easy for scholars, either, though the debates are intense and eloquent in ways I can hardly do any justice in a few paragraphs. “Theory of blackness is theory of the surreal presence,” writes Fred Moten (2018, ix) concerning the regime of “epidermalization, criminalization, and genocidal regulation” underlying the stolen lives that accompany blackness, in the face of which only a reconstructive flight from imposition seems to make sense. The entire edifice of modern thought is involved in this predicament, as the Brazilian feminist scholar Denise Ferreira da Silva (2007) has argued in one of the most incisive treatments of the long-standing philosophical background of antiblackness. In her view, the deployment of racial difference anchors an onto-epistemic regime that for centuries until today’s global times has prompted a kind of social subjection in which the most allegedly rational institutions of society, such as the law and the economy, provide the very tools of obliteration. This onto-epistemic context called globality, she argues, needs to be understood in these terms so as to undermine it.

Working within the archives of the Western critique of metaphysics, Calvin Warren (2018) develops this proposition, arriving at a political ontology of antiblackness as the most enduring constant in Western cultural history. For Warren, the prison-industrial complex as a form of reenslavement and the repeated police murdering of blacks should serve as testimony to the enduring force of this ontology at the social level. His argument, however, is primarily philosophical. From his perspective, all solutions on offer—whether couched in terms of black humanism, as in social and legal policies targeting antiblackness; or postmetaphysics, as in hermeneutic strategies proposing antiracist understandings of the human to contest racialized notions of being—are found wanting, if not counterproductive. The reason is that all these approaches overlook the fact that the black person fulfills the position of “nothing” in a world structured and ruled by metaphysical assumptions embedded in binary thinking, naturalized universals, liberal humanism, social rationalization, economism, and entrenched ideas of order, freedom, agency, and so forth. Only a politics of “improvement” is thinkable and practicable within this ontological order, and that will not suffice to redress the “metaphysical holocaust” (13) enacted by antiblackness as a systematic “accretion of practices, knowledge systems, and institutions designed to impose nothing onto blackness and the unending domination/eradication of black presence as nothing incarnated” (9; my emphasis).

For Warren, the corollary of this pervasive antiblackness is a kind of ontological terror that operates very differently for blacks (a perpetual falling, the source of violence and domination) than for whites (confronting the terror of the nothing that is blackness, and of the potential coming to an end of that nothing that, even if it were imaginable, could only be fathomed as a total upheaval of the existing metaphysical world, hence terror). From here follows a responsible black nihilism, with momentous implications:

Part of the aim, then, is to dethrone the human from its metaphysical pedestal, reject the human, and explore different ways of existing that are not predicated on Being and its humanism. This is the only way black thinking can grapple with existence without Being. . . . Perhaps what I am suggesting is an ontological revolution, one that will destroy the world and its institutions (i.e., “the end of the world,” as Fanon calls it). But these are our options, since the metaphysical holocaust will continue as long as the world exists. The nihilist revelation, however, is that such a revolution will destroy all life—far from the freedom dreams of the political idealists or the sobriety of the pragmatists. (23, 171)

The dire conclusion of an irredeemable antiblack world, from which no significant form of genuine coexistence can ever arise, has a redeeming end, for the abyss it sketches may lead into “something exceeding and preceding the metaphysical world” (171), namely, the spirit. It is thus that “black nihilism must rest in the crevice between the impossibility of transforming the world and the dynamic enduring power of spirit” (171).¹³

I find Warren’s formulation compelling for the most part. His accomplished nihilism could be seen as a counterpoint to the notion of a responsible anthropocentrism posited by posthumanism and many transition narratives. I can see its major premises applying to Afro-Latin America, with the pertinent qualifications. There, too, a pervasive structure of antiblackness hangs over social life as a great onto-epistemic unconscious, along with anti-indigeneity. Looking at the black kids striving to clean the windows of passing cars at the main intersections in Cali, Colombia, or attempting to sell fruit or distribute a newspaper, most frequently encountering a deeply naturalized disrespect as a response, a dehumanizing gaze over which they have no control, one would have to conclude that an antiblack structure is inextricably entwined with the entire fabric of Latin American Euro-modernity. As another instantiation of antiblackness, I could cite what the brilliant Afro-Colombian activist Carlos Rosero once told me, explaining why his movement does not fight for inclusion: “Neither do we want to become citizens, since to do so would amount to returning to the times of slavery.” As he put it elsewhere, “We are the descendants of the slave trade. Our papers say: ‘Afro-descendants: descendants of the Africans brought to America with the transatlantic slave trade.’ What do I personally think? If the slave trade is at the basis of capital accumulation, then inequality and racism are at the basis of the same process. I can make headway on the problem of territory, of ethno-education, up to a certain point, but if I do not solve the fundamental problem I do not solve anything” (cited in Escobar 2008, 69).

There are tensions between these Afro-Latin American statements and the African American radical thought so sketchily reviewed here. One source of tension is the emphasis on the political economy of antiblackness. It has always seemed to me much harder to articulate an anticapitalist critique in the United States as part of a critical race or gender discourse, whereas in Latin America an anticapitalist stance is most often taken as a given. But perhaps the most important source of tension stems from the agency that is often expressed by Afro-Latin American and other subaltern activists, committed as they are to fighting for lives of joy, meaning, and dignity, as among those struggling to keep the Colombian Pacific as a territory of life, peace, happiness, and freedom (see chapter 7). This agency, however, cannot be detected easily through philosophical and academic debates; it has to be experienced in place, as it happens; one would say, academically, that it has to be documented ethnographically, going well beyond the text. The valence of this agency is stressed in relational approaches to the city, focused on the everyday resourcefulness and survival tactics of popular groups in the poor neighborhoods of the Global South. In these works (e.g., Amin and Thrift 2017; Escobar 2019; Simone and Pieterse 2017), attention shifts to the play of affect, street intelligence, and network-like relational collective action—to the city’s “ground-level hum,” to use Amin and Thrift’s vivid notion (2017, 5). There the ethnographic analysis focuses on the multiplicity of popular practices that often arise out of the sheer fact that the city—and, one may add, the metaphysical infrastructure that underlies it—does not work according to plan.

We also see the emphasis on the political economy of antiblackness in African thinkers such as Achille Mbembe (2017), who emphasizes the connection between antiblackness, modernity, and capitalism, from the time of the Atlantic slave trade—what the Cameroonian philosopher Fabien Eboussi Boulaga (2014) fittingly calls “the catastrophe”—to today’s biodigital economy, finance capitalism, and neoliberal globalization. Do these various emphases pose challenges to the premises, conclusions, and politics of Afro-pessimism, even while sharing a great deal of its political ontology analysis? Only the question will be posed here, as I begin to move toward the conclusion. Let me quote from a contribution by Christina Sharpe to the Afro-pessimism debate to return to the initial question about the relation between modernist and pluriversal politics; in her view, Afro-pessimism is an attempt “to build a language that, despite the rewards and enticements to do otherwise, refuses to refuse blackness, that embraces ‘without pathos’ that which is constructed and defined as pathology. . . . It is work that insistently speaks what is being constituted as the unspeakable and enacts an ethical embrace of what is constituted as (affirmatively) unembraceable” (cited in Sexton 2016). This construes Afro-pessimism as an epistemological and an ethical project, which Jared Sexton also finds skillfully articulated in Wilderson’s statement about being able to, finally, “think Blackness and agency together in an ethical manner” (cited in Sexton 2016).

The most eloquent statements about the need to consider simultaneously the everyday effects of racism and antiblackness and the agency of those most subject to it, it seems to me, come from black and Latina feminists, particularly in their insistence on an open-ended, reconstructive politics of difference, even if they are fully aware of how such politics risk becoming ineffectual or counterproductive. Equally significant in this regard is the emphasis on spirituality, love, healing, and the care for the nonhuman world, within a frame of radical social justice, espoused by some black and Latina feminists, such as bell hooks (2000), Fania and Angela Davis (2016), Gloria Anzaldúa, Chela Sandoval, and Cherríe Moraga (e.g., Anzaldúa and Keating 2002). I believe that in the works of these authors—diverse as they are—these constructive emphases and the political ontology of antiblackness are not mutually exclusive, yet their articulation needs to be discussed as they are tried out in practice.

Such articulations can most powerfully be gleaned, in my view, from the recent work of some black feminists in both the United States and Colombia. Let me start with Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments, Saidiya Hartman’s (2019) incredibly original, powerful, and lucid reconstruction of the lives and deeds of young black women arriving from the South in New York (Harlem) and Philadelphia, between the 1880s and the 1930s, only to find an equally virulent, albeit different, form of racism in what they expected to be spaces of freedom in the urban North. The book’s opening paragraph goes so much against the grain that it bears quoting in toto: “At the turn of the twentieth century, young black women were in open rebellion. They struggled to create autonomous and beautiful lives, to escape the new forms of servitude awaiting them, and to live as if they were free. This book recreates the radical imagination and wayward practices of these young women by describing the world through their eyes. It is a narrative written from nowhere, from the nowhere of the ghetto and the nowhere of utopia” (2019, xiii). As Hartman goes on to say, the book’s aim is “to illuminate the radical imagination and everyday anarchy of ordinary colored girls, which has not only been overlooked, but is nearly unimaginable” (xiv). Upon arrival, what these girls find is “the plantation extended into the city” (4), the city as a new enclosure. This enclosure eventually became the “black ghetto,” cemented by liberal social reformers and sociologists, the state, and the police, with their spatial, moral, and social strategies for improvement, as if saying “Negro, don’t even try to live” (22). Women got the worst of it, owing to the entanglement of violence and sexuality that conditioned so much, if not everything, about them. Yet, Hartman tells us, the challenge is to see how they survived, and at times even thrived, in this context of brutality, deprivation, and poverty, how their beautiful experiments in living—in between the kitchen and the brothel, the street and the crowded tenements, the laundry work and their intimate lives in their bedrooms—yielded lives that were painful but at times also beautiful, fugitive moments of going about as if they were free, in the mist of “the insistent hunger of the slum” (84).

Hartman is surely painfully aware of the onto-epistemic grasp on black lives (“When would the colored female achieve her full status as a woman?” [177]), but she refuses to see only the horror and not the beauty, to linger on the tragedy without putting forward a compelling view of how young colored girls tried “to make a way out of no way, to not be defeated by defeat” (347). It was left to them to envision things otherwise, to dance within the enclosure, to set into motion “a fierce and expanded sense of what might be possible” (59). In so doing, they enacted another important moment in the long history of black radicalism and refusal. Hartman’s creative, careful, and loving unearthing of the histories of these forgotten young women demonstrates why another possible is, must be, possible. It is an invitation to us all to reply positively to her question, “Who else would dare believe another world was possible . . . [and] be convinced that nothing could be said about the Negro problem, modernity, global capitalism, police brutality, state killings, and the Anthropocene if it did not take her into account?” (347). Who indeed?

That there is an entire archive of the “being-in-difference” embodied by black women has been superbly explored by Avery Gordon in her most recent book. But it is a question not just of enacting difference but of how such difference at time gets to constitute veritable moments of an “other utopianism” capable of creating spaces of autonomy, however fugitive and temporary. It is in these zones that one can glean the at-times sophisticated subaltern consciousness and understanding of what it would mean to live in a better world held by the black women living in many of the world's popular neighborhoods. Paying attention to them might help us see why the utopian is not an absolute impossibility, since "it is in us," too, in "all those things we are and we do that exceed or are just not expressions of what is dominant and dominating us" (2018, 64). "Running away," she says—an ancestral and paradigmatic Afro-diasporic practice, one might add—"is a process . . . of trying to find a way of living in different terms, whose outcome is unfortunately never given in advance. It's extremely difficult to let go of living on their terms, to let go of the bad and the good and find another way. It requires a certain degree of embodied indifference or organs for the alternative that conviction or rhetoric alone does not yield. It requires a certain practice or preparation in property relations with which we are often less familiar" (185).

To end, let us explore this theme of running away, and Hartman's "Who else . . ." question, by listening to the narratives of another group of black women in another "black city-within-the-city" (Hartman 2019, 17), the Distrito de Aguablanca, or DAB (Aguablanca District), in the city of Cali. Almost nonexistent in 1980, today the DAB reaches 700,000 inhabitants, a large percentage of them Afro-Colombians who have been forcefully displaced by armed conflict and land grabbing in other parts of the country's Southwest, particularly the Pacific rain forest region. There, mujeresnegrasafrodescendientes de Cali (black-Afrodescendant-women of Cali, or munac), a term introduced by Elba Palacios to convey the entangled forms of oppression faced by black women but also the multiple dimensions of their resistance and creativity, display enormous courage and creativity in constructing urban territories. Black feminist activist groups in the DAB—among them Otras negras . . . y feministas!, the Casa Cultural el Chontaduro, and the Colectivo Sentipensar Afrodiaspórico (Afro-diasporic Sentipensar Collective)—investigate the realities of the munac, construct autonomous networks of support, and develop frameworks for peaceful and dignified coexistence (see Campo et al. 2018; Lozano 2014, 2016, 2017; Machado 2017; Palacios 2019). Theirs can be said to be a practice of weaving urban worlds, where racialized and ethnicized women may find safer conditions for daily urban living. "Reexistence" is a major trope of these women's groups, a process of creating autonomous lives and constructing auspicious conditions for fostering life in general, building on historical memories of oppression and the manifold forms of negation of their being, but also on the recollection of their struggles for freedom, including the experience of cimarronaje (running away, maroon experiences), that always anchor their actions. This decolonial black radical feminism gets at the core of the centuries-old power relations in cities such as Cali. Of the munac, one could say, echoing Hartman (2019, 59), that they might be bringing about a “revolution in a minor key” (59), even if it is largely invisible to most inhabitants of the city, particularly its white and mestizo elite and middle classes.

In the last section, I tried to stage a dialogue between Latin American critical thought and black radical thought and politics, highlighting the debates introduced by black feminists. At the academic level, one can muse over the possibility of sustained conversations among what, in my view, are some of the most vibrant academic debates at present, particularly the following strands: first, black radical thought and black and Latina feminist thought in the United States; second, Latin American decolonial feminisms (Espinosa, Gómez, and Ochoa 2014; Segato 2015, 2016), black feminist thought, and decolonial thinking (see, e.g., Mignolo and Walsh 2018 for recent statement); and third, the critical thinking emerging from indigenous intellectuals across the Americas.

The importance of the question of blackness and agency is paramount, if we are to heed Mbembe’s argument that, with the intensification of the global economy of dispossession, we are attending to a generalized blackness, a veritable becoming black of the world (2017, 6). Here again we find an array of positions in tension, including, among others, Mbembe’s appeal to a notion of a universal community, even if an open one—a common world in which all of us can be full human beings (182), on the heels of onto-epistemic restitution and reparation.

A Final Note on Political Ontology and Radical Relationality

Earlier I made the case that we all weave the pluriverse together through our designs and daily practices; thus the struggle to reinhabit the pluriverse in an Earth-wise manner is not just for indigenous peoples or people in the Global South but for everyone. The Native Canadian author Leanne Simpson has driven this point home vehemently, as far as indigenous peoples are concerned (2017, 246):

We must continuously build and rebuild indigenous worlds. This work starts in motion, in decolonial love, in flight, in relationship, in biiskabi-yang, in generosity, humility, and kindness, and this is where it also ends. I cannot be prescriptive here because these processes are profoundly intimate and emergent and are ultimately the collective responsibilities of those who belong to unique and diverse indigenous nations. I don't want to imagine or dream futures. I want a better present.

I would like to suggest that this statement—an active lesson from indigenous movements to all who wish to struggle for the pluriverse—applies to all worlds, with certain caveats. First, it is crucial to acknowledge that not all resistance is ontological in the relational sense that Simpson's Radical Resurgence Project so powerfully envisions. We need to push all strategies and forms of politics ontologically and decolonially. What I mean by this is the following: First, we all need to actively unlearn the ontologies of separation and a single real that shape our bodies and worlds; for instance, can we unlearn the liberal individual—that antirelational Trojan horse that inhabits each of us in modern worlds—in a similar way that we endeavor to unlearn patriarchy, racism, and heterosexism? Second, we all need to be mindful of the multiple ways in which our actions depend on, and often reinforce, the metaphysical infrastructure of the current dominant systems, including its universal constructs and objectifying relations, its anthropocentrism, secularism, and Eurocentrism, and its colonialist hierarchical classifications in terms of race, gender, and sexuality.

As the essays in this volume contend, most worlds live under ontological occupation. Such occupation is effected through the categories and hierarchical classifications historically deployed by governments, corporations, organized religions, and the academy as the main purveyors of a dominant onto-epistemic structure. Environmental conflicts in Latin America and elsewhere make this assertion patently clear. At stake, for instance, with the expansion of oil palm cultivation, large-scale hydroelectric dams, mining for gold and strategic minerals, and many mega development projects is not only the forced displacement, if not outright destruction, of particular territories and worlds but their active occupation by the modernist ontologies serving as scaffolding for relentless growth and hyperaccumulation at the top. This type of environmental-cum-ontological conflict is precisely the focus of political ontology, a nascent field that provides the architecture for this volume. The various essays contribute to constructing this emergent field as a space for exploring the politics of the pluriverse, building on the notion of multiple realities and possibles implicit in the agenda of many social movements. While the chapters can be read as self-contained units, they build toward this understanding through different registers. Many of the essays will provide readers with a synoptic view of Latin American social theory at present.

In locating these essays between the present moment (the brutality of neoliberal globalization) and the epoch (capitalist Euro-modernity), I have suggested that we might feasibly construe the current conjuncture in terms of a civilizational crisis. Whether one articulates the conjuncture as the struggle over modernity, going beyond Euro-modernity toward multiple modernities, as Grossberg (2010, 2019) has cogently done, or in terms of the crisis of civilizational models pointing to transitions beyond modernity as a key possibility space, and perhaps attractor, for a multiplicity of struggles, I side with scholars for whom the forging of new connections and transformative orientations is a central practice. Political ontology is part of this effort. As Blaser (2013) puts it, political ontology is not a new approach for another realist claim on the real; in fact, the forms of ontological politics discussed in this book are but a manner of foregrounding the array of ways of conceiving what exists so as to make tangible the claim of multiple ontologies or worlds. In this vein, political ontology is a way of telling the stories of world making differently, in the hope that other spaces for the enactment of the pluriverse might open up.

To conclude, let us listen to the straightforward and powerful rendition of articulatory politics by the women gathered at the International Forum on Feminicides of Racialized and Ethnicized Peoples, held in the predominantly black port city of Buenaventura, on the Colombian Pacific, not far from Cali, in April 2016. The forum denounced the systemic connection between the genocide of women, and black women in particular, and global capital accumulation. It brought together many of the lines of argumentation discussed in this preface, ending with a commitment to the radical relationality and pluriversal politics embedded in the notions of Ubuntu and Buen Vivir as civilizational alternatives. Radical relationality emerges in this kind of political space as the best possible antidote to the metaphysics of separation and isolation and the ontologies of antiblackness, coloniality, heteropatriarchal social orders, and the devastation of the Earth. Radical relationality is an answer to the imperative that “to reweave community out of the existing fragments should thus be our banner” (Segato 2016, 27). The forum’s final declaration partially states:

We analyzed together the current upsurge in diverse forms of violence against women and their relation with global capital accumulation and its racist and colonialist expression in Latin America. We concluded that feminicides are functional to territorial dispossession and the extermination of indigenous, black, and popular rural and urban communities and peoples. We also examined the forms of resistance and autonomous organizing by women from the space of their communities. . . . We experienced with joy women’s ability to create and re-create common existence, their active sharing and capacity to repair their grief and pain, transforming them into knowledge and struggles for justice.

We demand from the state, governments, transnational corporations, and [societies] in general to stop the war against women, their communities and peoples, to respect their territories and guarantee their lives. . . . We exhort social movement organizations to assume a deep commitment toward dismantling colonial capitalist patriarchy, so that we can journey in line with our desires and aspirations toward Ubuntu and Buen Vivir.¹⁴
