

acknowledgments

When you work on a book across more than a decade (even publishing another one in the middle of such work) and move across four institutions in two states, looking to belong, you change your mind often and you have too many beings to thank to begin to do justice to the level of support you feel for who you are in the world.

While no significant funding organization supported this work, I am indebted to two research leaves granted by the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in the spring of 2019 and 2020 that allowed me valuable time to put these chapters together. If it weren't for the pandemic that pulled back the skin of human being, exposing its living for all of us to see, this project wouldn't have found its temporal location and I wouldn't have found valuable time away from the troubled and troublesome hallways of my place of work to write the first full draft of this book. Thank you to the archivists and librarians at UCLA and Temple University, you were all invaluable to this work and I see you and thank you.

I want to thank Ken Wissoker of Duke University Press for always believing in what I have to say and how I need to say it. I want to thank Liz Smith for shepherding this book to its rightful place on the shelf. Thank you to Cathy Davidson for always reading the work when it's messy and helping me to see dry sand through muddy water. Thank you to Cary Wolfe, fellow traveler in animal studies back in 1999 when we were colleagues at SUNY, who talked and walked animal with me and taught me that in forty degrees below zero wind chill, "cotton kills." To Alexander Weheliye, who was there at the beginning and whose fine mind still intrigues me. Thank you for the loving embrace of my Chicago dyke family, Lisa Freeman, Heather Schmucker, Jennifer Briar, Kat Hindman, and Jennifer D. Brody, intimate travelers for this journey in animal life. Thank you to my Duke colleagues: lover of dogs Cathy Rudy, horsewoman Kristine Stiles, and Ranjana Khanna, who were all at the table when we took part in a human/animal graduate/faculty seminar and taking a deep feminist dive into Derrida, I began to understand that to hail an other, in theory, was never going to be enough.

To my UNC colleagues, Elizabeth (Betsy) Olson, Pat Parker, David Garcia, Jennifer Washington, and Renée Alexander Craft, thanks for making the Chair-verse survivable, at least for a time. To my Critical Ethnic Studies colleagues, Emil Keme and Kumi Silva, words cannot express how your being in the world holds me down. To my rowdy ones, partners in justice and always ready to speak truth to power, Malinda Maynor-Lowery and Kia Caldwell, you are my sisters and my kin; I know we tried to do something important together and that bond endures. To my colleagues and students in American Studies, who inspire by their example. To Rachel Gelfand and Katelyn Campbell, who were research assistants for this book, and especially to Katelyn Campbell who helped to bring this project to production. To Kimber Thomas, Elijah Heyward, and Rae Garringer, who survived the wreckage of our Black worlds and my little queer world in the belly of a beast that just won't quit; I love you all for bringing who we are, for bringing your full selves, to the open. To Danielle Dulken, fellow rider and lover of equines, and Ben Apple, both family now.

To my family, Robert Warrior, Sylvia Villarreal, Tae Hart, Katie and Jack McCabe, and Luke and Laura McCabe, I love you to the moon and back; you are precious to me. To my North Carolina people, Meta Jones, Sunny, Tizzúnu, Roo, Aidan, Winnie, Webster, Jonathan, Willie, Kelly, Andrew, Starr, Molly, Glenn, Katy, Darian, Shayla, and Charlie, you are my heart and I know we love this place we call home together, despite its ruins. To my food studies family, Cynthia Greenlee and Kelly Alexander, you are my badass interlocutors, always. To the chefs and the barbacks and the front of house folks who always feed me, Gabe Barker, Heather Shores, and Bill Smith, thank you. To my trainer and friend Micky Purcell, thank you for seeing me each and every day and helping me always find my way back to Annie when I get lost in this world. To the squad, Annette, Danielle, and Antonia, we are still talking sh*t and writing books. To my coach, Emily O'Barr, without whom this book would not have reached beyond the threshold that is my doorstep, thank you. To Sweet Negritude, a living thing—I found a home at the end of the world in your lush interior and I am grateful. To Tiffany Lethabo King, thank you for embracing my two-spirited self, and for the gift of your gorgeous mind.

And to my fierce and fiery Annie, there is no part of you that I do not love: from the hoofprints still etched on my ass that you left when you needed to impart a portion of your biography to me, to the delicious feel of your muzzle at the day's end, to your femaleness. Being with you is the best part of any waking hour and I hope I have done some tiny bit of justice to the world we share and make together. Yours is a capacious nervous system connected to the vastness that is this earth's vibration. We beat as one heart.
