

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

To research a book, let alone write one, is to accrue a massive debt to countless individuals and institutions. The fact that you are holding this book at all is a testament to the support of so many people who allowed me to bounce off ideas, read drafts, offer advice, or discuss the concepts and arguments that make up this work while we sat over a coffee or a bourbon. A line in the acknowledgments can never repay what so many of these people have done for me, but it is a start.

First, I have to thank all of the archivists and librarians who made accessible the body of documentation on which this work rests. The interesting connections this book is able to make are a testament to their knowledge and the patience they showed a young researcher. Particularly I am indebted to the archivists at the New York Municipal Archive and Ken Cobb, the New York Public Library, the Library of Congress, and John Jay College of Criminal Justice. I also owe a great debt to the thoughtful and supportive staff of Duke University Press, and especially Ken Wissoker, who spotted the potential in this project very early on.

This book was incubated when I was an undergraduate playing around with Freedom of Information Act requests and reading too much Foucault and to that end, I owe particular thanks to Karl Qualls, Matt Pinkser, Jeremy Ball, Elizabeth Lee, and the late Kim Lacy Rogers, who once told me that I could transition seamlessly from student to colleague. That meant the world to me. Special recognition belongs to Christopher Bilodeau who in particular put me on this path. This project was originally conceived under the instruction and education of the New York University History Department, and especially Andrew Needham, who directed me to the books that became the core historiographical foundation of this one.

This book would not exist without the history department at the University of Connecticut and in particular Peter Baldwin, Frank Costigliola, Nina Dayton, Mark Healey, Christopher Clark, Jeffery Ogbar, Melina Pappademos, Sylvia Schafer, Fiona Vernal, and Jason Chang. I could not have become the historian or writer I am today without the special guidance, community, and space given to me by the UConn Humanities Institute and the friendship and mentorship offered to me there by Michael Lynch, Alexis Boylan, Brendan Kane, Nasya Al-Saidy, and Jo-Ann Waide-Wunschel.

I am especially grateful to Melanie Newport, who has been my window into the larger world of carceral studies and a tireless advocate of my work; Jelani Cobb, whose support of me as an author and a writer for the public have been unquantifiable; and Micki McElya, whose genius, support, generosity, and historiographical wizardry is evident on every page of this book.

My colleagues and friends whose help with this project I will never be able to repay are Gabrielle Wescott, Graham Stinnett, Maggie Stack, Mary Mahoney, Allison Horrocks, Jorell Meléndez-Badillo Carolyn Levy, Danielle Dumaine, and Nathan Braccio.

Thanks go to the Immigration and Ethnic History Society for the generous support and recognition, especially Julian Lim and Maddalena Marinari. I would also like to thank the Urban History Association for giving me a chance to write for the public about the history of policing and for connecting me to a much larger community of incredible writers and thinkers. Ryan Reft and Avigail Oren are tremendous editors and friends.

I also have to thank my colleagues at the UC-Berkeley, UC-Hastings, and the Electronic Frontier Foundation for providing such an intellectually stimulating and supportive environment for continuing my academic work. Under their watchful eyes have I been able to create a cohesive vision for my scholarship.

The larger community of carceral studies have given me more than I will ever be able to say, but I owe so much to Carl Suddler, Marisol LeBrón, Alex Vitale, Jennifer Fronc, Daniel Czitrom, Heather Ann Thompson, Elizabeth Hinton, Brendan McQuade, and Khalil Gibran Muhammad, many of whom took time out of their busy schedules to talk to me about this project, even at its very early stage. There is no way to fully articulate how grateful I am for the comradery and generosity of Anna Lvovsky, Simon Balto, Max Felker-Kantor, Stuart Schrader, Anne Gray-Fischer, Emily Brooks, and Charlotte Rosen for reading drafts, giving me advice, and making me feel included in a growing field.

My friends and family have had to endure so many dinners, parties, and long walks listening to me talk about this project that they all deserve special ribbons and awards, especially Drew Rivard, Kyle Horton, Timmy Semenza, Patrick Reiher, Zack Garlitos, Bryna Hautau, Ryan Carey, and Andrew Guy. I owe special thanks to my in-laws, John and Mildred, as well as to Jack Spalding and the whole Spalding-Cross family for being big supporters. My siblings and their spouses, Sarah, Noah, Emily, Harrison, uncles Roy and Keith, and my bubbe Barbara and Norbert have been cheering me on since the beginning, and this book is dedicated in part to them. My parents, Louis and Beth, have made every word written possible and made me the thinker I am today.

None of this would be possible without the help and support of my number one sounding board and co-conspirator, my wife, Holly. Her patience, curiosity, and encouragement inspired me to write even in the moments when I did not have the patience, curiosity, or encouragement to motivate myself.

Finally, I want to dedicate this book to the people for whom none of this knowledge is new or surprising. Intergenerational survivors of state violence will always viscerally know the interior labors of power, and how to resist it, better than I ever will in an academic or personal way. This book is an oath, of sorts, that I will continue the work.
